Bomb blast wounds 20 in Be'er Sheva

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — After months of focusing on its withdrawal from the Gaza Strip, Israel returned to an all-too-familiar experience this week: Palestinian terror.

A suicide bomber wounded 20 people Sunday at the central bus station in the southern Israeli city of Be'er Sheva, the first such attack since the evacuation of all the Jewish settlements in Gaza and four in the northern West Bank last month.

It could have been worse. The bomber was blocked from boarding a bus, as a result of the vigilance of two guards who chased him away. Both were seriously hurt. It was not immediately clear which terrorist group was responsible for the attack.

Those opposed to the pullout said the attack proved that the Gaza withdrawal had emboldened Palestinian terrorists. But the government, which approved the hand-over of Gaza's southern border to Egypt, placed the blame on the Palestinian Authority.

"There are groups and individuals who are trying to disturb the process of peace," Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres told reporters. "Now we shall draw the necessary conclusions. We hope that the Palestinian Authority will do likewise, because terror is damaging, not only to the security of Israel but also to the destiny of the Palestinians."

For Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, the attack could not have come at a worse time. Just minutes earlier, he broadcast a statement on Israel Radio assuring listeners that the truce he declared with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in February would stay in force indefinitely.

Graves moved to Israel from Gaza

The families of the 48 people buried in the Neveh Dekalim cemetery in Gaza will have their relatives' graves moved to cemeteries within Green Line Israel chosen by each family, where they will be reinterred. The moving of the civilian graves is being carried out by the Gush Katif burial society and a funeral service will be held at each new site. The first grave was moved on Sunday and buried in a new cemetery in Nitzan, where several Gaza families have been relocated. Seen is the Neve Dekalim cemetery, where relatives visited the graves of their loved ones before the bodies were relocated.

Blind Israeli golfer erases handicap

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

They say seeing is believing, but that all-purpose aphorism applies only in part to Israeli golfer Zohar Sharon.

At the driving range, spectators stand back and watch in amazement as the 54-year-old moshavnik drills balls far into the distance. During a friendly round at Maple Downs Golf & Country Club, north of Toronto, his playing partners watch in awe at his smooth and balanced swing, his club head speed and the accuracy of his shots.

His facility around the golf course is something to behold, and Sharon picks up on the vibes of his playing partners and the feedback from his trusted caddy, Shimshon Levy. He has to rely on the input of others because he can't actually see what he's doing.

An Israeli army veteran who was wounded in action, Sharon has been totally blind for more than 25 years. But despite his disability, he manages to strike the ball solidly and with remarkable accuracy, proving that in golf, it's all about the swing.

At the par 4, 387-yard third hole at Maple Downs, Sharon registered a stunning achievement when he drained his second shot to record his first-ever eagle (two strokes under par), something most sighted golfers would give their eye teeth to do.

His first shot off the tee was flawless

The News in Brief

CANADA

Matlin Headlines

VANCOUVER — Academy Award-winner Marlee Matlin will be the featured speaker at the Sept. 8 launch of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver's 2005 Combined Jewish Appeal campaign. The hearing-impaired Matlin, who won the 1987 best actress Oscar for Children of a Lesser God, will speak about overcoming challenges and learning to "live generously," the theme of the campaign.

Nidal Reference Pulled

VANCOUVER — An online course at the University of British Columbia's business school that suggested notorious Palestinian terrorist Abu Nidal was a "freedom fighter" was changed last month after a complaint from U.S. academic Daniel Pipes, who monitors universities for anti-Israel bias. The course on real estate and the law had students consider a fictitious situation about damages to property. The question began with the passage: "Quin owned acreage in Langley which he leased to Abu Nidal as a training camp for freedom fighters." Assistant business dean Dale Griffin told Canadian Press the reference was changed because it was inappropriate. He said the question had been part of the course since 1991, but it's not known who wrote it. Nidal was killed in Iraq in 2002.

Retreat Vandalized

MONTREAL — A chassidic community's summer camp near Montreal was vandalized overnight on Aug. 18. The cottage the Belz community's camp uses for prayer services in Val Morin, Que., was broken into and siddurim were thrown into toilets and a nearby lake. The group is in a legal battle with some local residents who say they disturb others during the summer. Torah scrolls kept in a safe were not damaged.

WORLD

UN Funding Criticized

NEW YORK — Jewish groups protested UN financing for a propaganda poster at a Palestinian Authority rally. A tag line on a poster at last month's rally in Gaza that read, "Gaza today, West Bank and Jerusalem tomorrow," said the sign was paid for by the UN Development Program. The United Nations "has no business paying the costs of this propaganda, especially when it is aimed at a member state," the American Jewish Congress said. A UN official said the aid is not for political uses and the incident is being investigated.

Robertson Raps Israel

VIRGINIA BEACH — Televangelist Pat Robertson says God will judge Israel for withdrawing from Gaza. "The almighty God said he was going to judge the nation which has parted from his land and that he was going to bring judgment upon that nation," the Jerusalem Post reported him saying, citing the Christian Coalition's website. Robertson has long backed Israeli settlers.

Jewish Influence?

LONDON — Jewish leaders criticized Britain's main Muslim group for saying a pro-Israel lobby influenced BBC filmmakers. In an open letter to the BBC, the Muslim Council of Britain said the makers of a documentary about the group were swayed by "highly placed supporters of Israel in the media." The hour-long film, which aired Aug. 21, explored whether the council could control extremism among Britain's 1.5 million Muslims. The BBC has rejected the accusations.

Ex-Nazi Dies Waiting

NEW YORK — An ex-Nazi guard died before he could be deported from the United States. Jakob "Jack" Reimer, who took part in persecuting Jews in Poland in World War II, died Aug. 3 at 86. In 1998, Reimer, of Elizabeth, N.J., was found to have lied about his wartime activities when he applied to enter the United States in 1951. The U.S. Justice and Homeland Security departments had started deportation proceedings against him.

Federal Gov't Urged to Act on War Criminals

TORONTO — Ottawa should move quickly to prosecute people who are directly involved or complicit in crimes against humanity, David Matas, senior legal counsel to B'nai Brith Canada, told a federal Liberal caucus meeting in Regina and a cabinet meeting in Winnipeg last week.

"Wholesale reform of both the Citizenship and Immigration acts" are needed to make the process of revoking war criminals' citizenship work, Matas said in his submission.

"The first order of business… has to be the revocation of citizenship of the five outstanding cases awaiting disposition," he said, referring to the cases of Helmut Oberlander, Vladimir Katriuk, Jacob Fast, Michael Baumgartner and Wasyl Odynsky. Some of those cases have been languishing in the legal system for up to 10 years, ever since Federal Court judges found the men had obtained Canadian citizenship by lying about their participation in the Nazi killing machinery.

In June, Citizenship and Immigration Minister Joe Volpe said he would ask cabinet to revoke their citizenship.

Jewish institutions damaged by torrential rain

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

Several Jewish communal buildings were among the sites damaged by the torrential storm that hit the Greater Toronto Area on Aug. 19, and last week synagogues, schools and funeral homes were working to dry out and clean up.

The damage to Beth Radom Congregation in North York was extensive, with president Saul Libstug estimating the damage to be valued at approximately $125-150,000.

"All the damage is downstairs in the basement. There is, thank God, no damage upstairs in the main sanctuary," he said.

Libstug noted that as a result of the sewers backing up in the storm, the basement, offices, school rooms, small sanctuary and library were flooded.

At press time, the extent of the damage to the congregation's books remained unknown.

At Beth Tikvah Synagogue on Bayview Avenue, director of administration Lillian Cornfield would not disclose the exact damage caused to the building except to say that there was "extensive water damage in the sanctuary." She was quick to add, however, that the bimah was not damaged and that they were very lucky that none of the Torahs sustained damage either.

After the storm, the Shabbat morning service had to be held in the social hall rather than the sanctuary, she said, but services at the synagogue have continued as scheduled and two weddings took place as planned last week.

Clean-up plans are well underway and Cornfield said, "We were fortunate that we had a lot of people who came in to help us clean up."

Rabbi Neil Cohen, president of Beth Avraham Yosef of Toronto (BAYT) in Thornhill, said last week that while some water entered the building, "it does not look like our shul suffered any extensive damage. However, the house and maintenance committee is still assessing the situation."

The Pride of Israel Synagogue in North York did not get away so lightly.

Each day a bonus

From the editor's desk

Aharon Appelfeld, the profoundly moving Israeli author, writes in A Table for One (Toby Press), that all his books "are essentially an inner conversation."

Thus, in a certain sense, we, his readers are invited to eavesdrop on him as he "converses" inwardly, with the soul that was formed in part through the inexplicable dark of Hitler's Europe. And we are astonished at what we "hear" – a voice that is poignant and purposeful and speaks to him – to us – with spare, unembellished clarity.

Two weeks ago, I had the privilege of engaging the award-winning author in "external" conversation. We met on the eve of the forced evacuations from Gaza for lunch at the fabled Anna Ticho House in the heart of downtown Jerusalem. Though merely steps away from Jaffa Road, the art gallery/ restaurant is a quiet, serene idyll amidst the loud clash of Jerusalem's congested traffic noises.

Appelfeld was already at the table when I entered, writing in longhand, the sentences and paragraphs that were undoubtedly destined for his next published work.

As has been his habit for decades, the poet-author has preferred to compose his works in the coffee houses of Jerusalem. Indeed, A Table for One, translated by Aloma Halter, recounts his experiences and his reflections in many of those coffee shops. It is a remarkable collection of personal vignettes in which the renowned writer collaborates with his son, Meir, a celebrated painter in his own right. The father has written about his writer's life in Jerusalem and the son, in expressive hues of beiges, browns and gold, has painted many of the cityscapes that comprise his father's city. It is an inspiring book.

We sat for more than an hour at a small table, discussing aspects of the compelling news of the day, i.e., disengagement, in between bites of our respective meals. Appelfeld was courtly in his bearing, polite and deferential, a throwback to another time and certainly to a place other than intense Jerusalem.

For Appelfeld, the debate over disengagement is the outer manifestation of the debate between what he describes as the two main public groupings in Israeli society: the religiously observant and the non-observant. There is a gulf between the two groupings, which he acknowledges is very difficult to bridge.

Born in Czernowitz, Romania, in 1932, Appelfeld was deported to a concentration camp at the age of eight, escaped, and spent three years hiding in Ukraine before joining the Russian army. He found his way to Mandatory Palestine in 1946. His work has been a resettling into a unified whole, the pieces of broken childhood memories that have suffused his life since he first set foot on the shores of Eretz Yisrael.

Aharon Appelfeld

Appelfeld laments the fact that the current, younger generation of Israelis seems unconnected with the history of their forebears, both immediate and ancient.

"The older, founding generation was familiar with Jewish history and Jewish sensibilities but did not pass that familiarity on to the next generation.

"And the survivors could not.

"They [the survivors] did not know how to pass on their Jewish experiences to their children. The Shoah generation could not pass on their experiences but, in truth, nor did Israeli society encourage that they do so."

Appelfeld intimates, but does not explicitly say, that perhaps the gap between the two societal groupings might be more bridgeable were there a greater awareness of Jewish history, experience and sensibilities among the broad swath of young and old Israelis.

But when asked whether he is pessimistic about the situation, he replies with the hint of a smile.

"People who survived the Shoah felt as if they were the only Jews who had survived. From this perspective, everything that comes the next day is a bonus."

The very existence of Israel, he makes clear, is reason for optimism and proof of the resilience and purpose that have been embodied in the lives of the survivors. "It is true, the State of Israel restored the survivors; but it is also true that the survivors built the state. Every field of national endeavour – whether large industry, science or the arts – has been advanced by survivors."

Appelfeld's reflections in A Table for One, he writes, "have been a kind of confession… about a religious attitude to life… When I say religious attitude, I mean the belief that inside every person, landscape and still life, there is hidden a noble beauty."

This credo, if we can aptly call it that, is quite remarkable when one remembers Appelfeld's early life experiences. But perhaps his personally "restored and rebuilt" life is also a metaphor for the sovereign State of Israel, also human, fallible, vulnerable, yet strong, poignant and purposeful too.

I also recommend to readers the recently available The Story of a Life, by Appelfeld (Schocken Books), also translated by Aloma Halter. It is a haunting, superbly instructive read. – MBD

Ont. hate crime unit receives provincial funding

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The government of Ontario has extended for one year the funding of a hate crime investigative unit that co-ordinates intelligence gathering for municipal police departments.

Monte Kwinter, minister of community safety and correctional services, announced the McGuinty government would provide $200,000 for the Hate Crime Extremism Investigative Team, a body that co-ordinates intelligence information among five Ontario police departments. At the same time, he said the team would expand to include 10 police forces.

Police units in Toronto, York, Durham, Halton and Oxford will join those from London, Waterloo, Guelph, Hamilton and Ottawa that are already part of the team, he said.

"Ontario's diversity is our strength," Kwinter said at a news conference at the Police Service building in downtown Toronto. "With this funding, the McGuinty government is fighting hate crimes and working to ensure tolerance and equality prevail across our province."

Noting that hate crimes in Ontario have increased by 93 per cent since 1996, Kwinter said the funding will ensure that police stay one step ahead of hatemongers and racists.

Last winter, however, the unit's funding appeared in jeopardy. A spokesperson for Kwinter's ministry informed the unit its funding would be reduced, but the minister quickly reversed that decision. However, for 10 weeks beginning in late March, the unit's lone staffer, Abbee Corb, was not paid. Funding resumed on June 15.

Prior to that, the Hate Crime Extremism Investigative Team had requested $516,000 over three years to continue its work and to expand.

Sgt. Gerry Nugent of the Waterloo Regional Police Service said expansion of the team to include 10 police forces "is a benefit to all of us."

Nugent, the senior police officer in charge of the intelligence team, said the addition of five services will increase the number of investigators that can be called on, boost the resources available to investigators, improve the flow of information and end duplication of work.

"A lot of the groups we look at, whether hate or extremism, are very mobile," he said. "One day they're here, another [they're in] Toronto."

A key asset used by the unit's members is a database compiled by Corb, the team's open source intelligence specialist. The database includes a roster of extremists, their profiles, visual aids (photos of tattoos and symbols used by extremist groups), photos of events, copies of more than 2,000 intelligence reports, profiles of individuals of interest, information on international terrorist groups and other information of value to the police.

Spokespeople from the Jewish, Arab and African-Canadian communities applauded the expansion and related funding, though Mohamed Boudjenane of the Canadian Arab Federation questioned whether $200,000 was enough. (Nugent said when funding runs out next year, the unit may have to request financial support from other ministries or from local police departments.)

Kwinter, meanwhile, told reporters that while he was announcing a one-time grant, the unit might receive subsequent funds.

Canadian Jewish Congress, which had pushed for funding for the hate crimes units, said the announcement is a boost to communities targeted by hatemongers.

"We are strongly encouraged by the government's commitment," said Frank Bialystok, chair of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region. "These crimes affect all communities, and we support this initiative without reservation."

Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president, said, "We have moved into an unprecedented era in which law enforcement requires more diligence and inter-agency teamwork to proactively deal with all forms of extremism. We urge the government to build on what it has begun by expanding its policing network to include all hate crime units across the province and to provide dedicated and sustained year over year funding to reflect what we are sure is a top government priority to combat hatred and extremism."

AN UPLIFTING EXPERIENCE: On a recent bus trip, 34 seniors from the Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community went to Niagara-on-the Lake. It was "an unforgettable, exciting experience" for one of the residents. For the first time, Sylvia Weinrieb was able to join other residents as a result of a special bus that was equipped with a hydraulic lift. Weinrieb entered the back of the bus while sitting in her wheelchair.

Yad Vashem asks Jews to record survivors' names

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

Since Yad Vashem launched a database of the names and life stories of Jewish Holocaust victims nearly a year ago, the campaign to garner as many names as possible has reached a fever pitch.

The International 11th Hour Campaign is meant to encourage members of the community to co-ordinate projects through their synagogues or community centres to help survivors remember and record the names of their friends and family who were killed.

At the launch party for the database last year, Avner Shalev, chair of the Yad Vashem directorate, said, "We are reaching a crucial historical hour. This is a race against time. We must record as many names as possible before the generation that best remembers them is no longer with us. We call on families around the globe to help honour the memories of their ancestors by recording their names."

Estee Yaari, the foreign media liaison at Yad Vashem, agrees and hopes that this project will help immortalize the Holocaust victims.

"In less than six years, the Nazis murdered six million Jews. They attempted to destroy not only their lives, but any memory of them as well. At Yad Vashem, we are dedicated to remembering them," she said.

Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem, created forms as early as the mid-1950s that contain the names and biographical details of Jews who died at the hands of the Nazis.

These forms, known as pages of testimony, are preserved as "symbolic tombstones" in the Hall of Names in the memorial.

List electronically organized in 1989

But it wasn't until 1989 that the list was electronically organized. Yaari said that 16 years ago, the Volcker Commission, whose role was to establish the rightful owners of dormant Swiss bank accounts that may have belonged to Holocaust victims, needed a list of victims to cross-reference their findings.

"Yad Vashem was the only organization that had such a comprehensive listing on the pages of testimony collection," Yaari said. "The commission provided Yad Vashem with the seed money with which to computerize the lists."

After 1,000 hours of extensive scanning and data entry, Yad Vashem launched the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names onto its website in late 2004.

The database, which records names of those who perished, as well as those who survived, offers many search variations for each name. A person can search for a name in different languages, by nicknames, or an entry can be searched by the name of the submitter, birth city, place of last-known residence and death camp.

To date, the database contains three million names and the hope is that the number will continue to grow.

"While people can still submit new names on hard copies of the pages of testimony forms, the database allows people to submit new names online," Yaari said. "This can be done by individuals from their own PCs or through community projects geared at recovering unknown names of Holocaust victims."

Yaari understands that recording all six million of the victims is impossible as entire families and towns were erased, leaving no one behind to remember them.

But she is optimistic that the team at Yad Vashem, with the help of Jewish communities around the world, will be able to recover another two million names for the database.

"In the future, when there are no survivors left to give testimony to the next generation, this database will serve as a virtual resource, monument and memorial to the six million," she said.

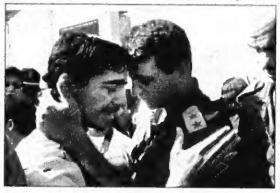
Purity of arms

The evacuation of the Jews from Gaza and four northern West Bank communities ended sooner than Israeli officials had anticipated and with far less incident than had been feared. Apart from an ugly scene on the rooftop of the Kfar Darom synagogue, during which Israeli security forces seized control of the roof of the building and ousted protesters, the evictions were essentially effected without violence.

The relative calm dispatch with which the operation concluded was a tribute to the settlers themselves and their leaders. Despite the enormity of their personal trauma, by and large, they left their homes, though grudgingly, displaying great deference to the soldiers, whose task most of the settlers understood to be, at its core, upholding the rule of law.



The violent resistance that did occur turned out to be the mischief of misguided youth who had infiltrated the Gaza communities on the eve of the evacuation.

But the expeditious manner in which the evacuation was carried out was also due to the supremely thoughtful and compassionate manner in which the men and women of the security forces conducted themselves. The photo inset in the editorial captures a display of that compassion with poignant clarity. The Israel Defence Forces officer tenderly, lovingly embraces the young man who is crying.

Soldiers showed super-human restraint and did not raise a hand against the settlers even as they absorbed emotional outbursts and abject vilification. Soldiers and settlers prayed together, kissed the sefer Torah together and sang Hatikvah together.

A senior, combat-hardened IDF officer who took part in the disengagement probably expressed the feelings of most of the soldiers when he told the daily newspaper Ma'ariv, while still in the midst of the disengagement: "It is a difficult situation. There is nothing like this in any battle. I am with the settlers. I understand them. I try to do everything I can to make it easier for them. But I also think that democracy is important above all."

The gentle, understanding touch of the soldier's hand upon the sobbing settler's shoulder gives new meaning to one of the IDF's essential core values – purity of arms.

It is an army unlike any other and deserving of the highest praise and accolades.

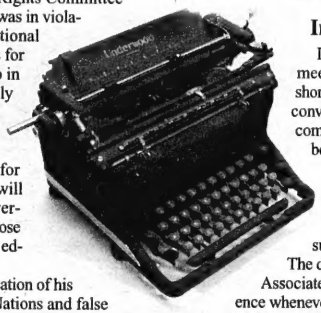
Mostyn on Dryden and the Liberals

Although my press conference at the Menorah Nursery with Carol Skelton, social development critic for the Conservative Party of Canada, was mentioned in passing in the article "Dryden defends gov't record on Israel, day care," (CJN, Aug. 18), unfortunately its content was not.

Ken Dryden's day-care model does not assist low-income earners, shift workers and stay-at-home mothers, and it will not support anyone sending their children to private Jewish day-care facilities, unlike the Conservative day-care policy, which promotes parental choice.

While Dryden, Canada's minister of social development, should be using his power and influence at the federal level to pressure the government of Ontario to comply with international law – the United Nations Human Rights Committee ruled in November 1999 that Canada was in violation of Article 26 of the International Covenant of Civil and Political Rights for failing to treat all religions in Ontario in an equal manner regarding publicly funded religious education – he is doing the opposite by promoting an educational policy that further discriminates against Jewish education for children under the age of six, which will only serve to increase an already overwhelming tax burden on those who choose to provide their children with a Jewish education.



Lastly, I find Dryden's weak justification of his party's anti-Israel bias at the United Nations and false implication that it has improved very disturbing. Despite other issues Dryden may stand for, it is sad that the member of Parliament for York Centre, which has one of the largest Jewish population in Canada, doesn't include strong support for a democratic Israel and equality at all levels of education among them.

In memory of Rabbi Witty (1)

We were fortunate enough to have been enriched by the knowledge and wisdom of the late Rabbi Yitzchak Witty ("Former BJE head was in 'a league beyond the ordinary,'" CJN, Aug. 11).

As students of the Jewish education program at York University, we gathered together every Wednesday morning during the three years of the program. Sitting in his presence, we enjoyed many hours discussing everything from Jewish holidays, to Mishnah, Talmud and prayers. Rabbi Witty had the unique talent of educating us on how to teach these topics in a knowledgeable, fascinating and entertaining manner. Many stories, midrashim and personal accounts were interjected throughout the lesson and have stayed with us ever since. We still remember and tell these stories as teachers to our students and thus pass on his teachings and legacy.

Rabbi Witty taught us to aspire to excellence, to raise the bar, to expect the most from our students, to be compassionate, and to celebrate Judaism in our classrooms every day. Rabbi Witty will remain in his students' hearts forever, as a true teacher, mentor and role model. We will miss him.

In memory of Rabbi Witty (2)

I first met Rabbi Yitzchak Witty at a staff meeting at the Associated Hebrew Schools shortly after his arrival in Toronto in 1969. I was convinced from the start that Toronto's Jewish community – and its educational system – had been blessed with a great new leader.

Seldom does one come across such a great public speaker and lecturer as Rabbi Witty. Yet public speaking was just one of his many great talents. He was also a superb ba'al tfillah, with a beautiful voice. The davening at our shul (the Neptune branch of Associated) was guaranteed to be a moving experience whenever he led the service.

But notwithstanding his many diverse interests and his remarkable abilities, Rabbi Witty was never boastful or arrogant. He was always friendly and unassuming. Whenever a new opportunity arose for Jewish cultural activity in Toronto, Rabbi Witty was always there to offer leadership.

He was among those rare individuals who leave behind a void that can never be filled. We will all sorely miss him.

Response to Rev. MacPherson

Rev. Damian MacPherson of the Roman Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto takes issue with my critical view of the legacy of the late Pope John Paul II ("John Paul II's legacy: 'One step forwards, two steps backwards,'" CJN, April 28), and accuses me of a "reverse form of anti-Semitism against Catholic leadership" (Letter, CJN, Aug. 4).

Besides the silliness of his idea that criticizing the leaders of the Catholic Church is a form of anti-Semitism, he is unfortunately using the old method of avoiding irrefutable facts and attacking the messenger rather than debating the merits, or faults, of the message.

After two stressful weeks, Israelis need a break

By LARRY DERFNER
Jerusalem Post

There's a lot of well-intentioned sentiment, mainly from overseas, for Israel to "strike while the iron's hot." The idea is to build on the momentum of the last two weeks and move as soon as possible into Stage 2 of disengagement – evacuating the 60,000 to 70,000 settlers on the far side of the West Bank security barrier, and thereby end the occupation completely.

While I agree with the goal, I don't think now is the time to reach for it. In another year to year-and-a-half, Israelis will, I expect, be ready to think about confronting the settlements in the heart of the West Bank, even if Prime Minister Ariel Sharon or his successor won't be. But they're not ready now.

The pro-disengagement majority in this country wants and needs a breather. They've just gone head-to-head with Israel's most fiercely ideological Jews, and while they won, it has been a joyless victory. People in the national religious camp feel like they've lost their country, and Israelis want to give them time to find their way back into the national fold. Some 9,000 settlers have had their lives shattered, and society wants them to at least start rebuilding their lives before it considers uprooting another 60,000 to 70,000 citizens.

For Israel to do something as divisive and gruelling as the evacuation of settlements, public opinion has to be very heavily behind it, and while it was for Stage 1, it isn't yet for Stage 2. The public first needs a rest to let the losers' devastation subside, along with the winners' guilt.

And during that rest, Israel will also have the opportunity to test whether disengagement from Gaza works or not – a pretty reasonable thing to do before tearing down dozens more settlements in the West Bank.

If the right-wing opposition proves correct, and missiles fired from Gaza start landing in Ashkelon and thereabouts and Israel is unable to stop them, or is forced to send the army back into Gaza for good to stop them, then very few Israelis will agree to withdraw unilaterally from the heart of the West Bank. I sure won't.

But if disengagement works – if Gaza turns out to be incomparably less dangerous for Israelis than it's been up to now, if the Qassams and mortars are effectively grounded, if the quiet not only holds in Ashkelon but spreads to Sderot – then public support for Stage 2 could get even higher than it was for Stage 1. Disengagement wouldn't be such a gamble anymore, it would be more of a known quantity.

But it's going to take at least a year of quiet for Israelis within rocket range of Gaza for disengagement to prove itself. It took about that long for the traumatized people of Kiryat Shmona to be convinced of the wisdom of Israel's May 2000 unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon. If, after a year or so, the fearful residents of Sderot see cause to change their minds about disengagement, it will be time to talk about Stage 2.

Meanwhile, despite the pro-Israel consensus, the ball is not in the Palestinians' court. The whole logic of unilateral disengagement rests on the recognition that the Palestinians are not players at all, not peace partners, that they do not have the willingness or capability to deliver peace in return for land. This leaves Israel to decide, on the basis of its national interests, which territory it wants to relinquish to the Palestinians – while warning them of heavy retaliation if they attack, and trusting that this deterrent power will keep the Palestinians there quiet and the Israelis living in the surrounding areas safe.

So, according to the logic of disengagement, the ball is in the court of Israel's deterrent capability. There were no expectations before that Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas had power over the terrorists, and there's no reason for such expectations now.

But what if Gaza cools down and the West Bank heats up – what would that mean for Stage 2? I don't think it would mean anything, and if the Palestinians are encouraged to restart the intifadah in the West Bank, the Shin Bet and Israel Defence Forces have shown in the last two years that they can shut down even the most highly motivated guerrillas.

If the West Bank does stir again, the hawks will immediately use it as proof of disengagement's failure while the doves will use it as further proof of occupation's failure. Yet the real lesson for Stage 2 will be learned in Gaza, not the West Bank. Gaza is where disengagement is being tried, so that's where the experiment will succeed or fail. By the end of next year we should know the answer. The people in Sderot will be able to tell us.

But whether or not Israel decides later to evacuate the interior of the West Bank, it should start right away taking down the illegal makeshift outposts there. Those mobile homes and tents aren't anybody's home, they're only a second home to a couple of thousand teenagers and other "second generation" settlers. No government sent them to live there. They're living there in defiance of the government, the IDF and the law. Israelis have no patience for those places or the people in them, and every time the IDF bulldozes these shacks and arrests the rioting squatters, the public is gratified. All the outposts have to go – the sooner the better.

As for Kiryat Arba, Ofra, Beit El, Elon Moreh and dozens more recognized, established communities on the far side of the security fence, that's going to take time. The occupation is still going to be with us for a few more years, at least. And before starting to dismantle it altogether, Israeli society has to be politically and psychologically prepared.

So to all of Israel's well-intentioned friends abroad: talk to us next August. January 2007 at the latest. We should have our strength back by then. We'll also know more than we do now.

Olives of peace

Amin Hassan is a somewhat greying, though youthful, man, who projects, when you first meet him, a certain dignity and kindness. Of Druze descent, he hails from the village of Sajur, a short distance from Safed. Once a senior officer in the Israeli police force, he now serves as director general of the Israel Olive Oil Board.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

My family and I spent a day with Amin during a recent trip to Israel. On that visit, he proudly showed us around the board's headquarters at the Chanania Farm, which is nestled deep in the rolling hills of the upper Galilee. He took us to lunch at a restaurant in the nearby Christian Arab village of Gush Halav – where, incidentally, the hummus must be the best in all of Israel – and he later drove us to the village outskirts, to view the Lebanese border just across the valleys below.

But what we learned on that hot summer's day went far beyond the geography of northern Israel. Amin's focus, though inextricably tied to the surroundings that he helped us to explore, was on what's been produced on that land since biblical times – olives. He began by telling us about the region's annual olive festival, which is supported financially by both the government of Israel and the European Commission's DELTA Project (which funds initiatives in selected parts of the world to "enhance synergies between economic, environmental, and cultural heritages").

The festival, held each November, brings together Jewish, Arab, and Druze olive growers at harvest time and gives them an opportunity to collaborate on the production and marketing of their crops. It also attracts thousands of tourists to the area.

Amin spoke also, with great passion and personal investment, about another program that he looks forward to bringing to fruition in the near future. His dream is to establish at the Chanania Farm "an educational centre for peace, under the symbol of the olive branch."

The programs he envisages will be directed mostly toward young people and will emphasize cross-cultural understanding and communication. It will feature an olive museum, exhibiting ancient and modern techniques of olive oil production, and an archeological garden that will have on display authentic machinery used in the cultivation of olives.

On our way to lunch in Gush Halav, Amin had us stop at the nearby Meron Junction, the site where, on Aug. 4, 2002, Egged bus number 361, en route from Haifa to Safed, was destroyed by a suicide bomber. Nine people were killed and 50 were injured in the attack.

Among the dead was Maysoun Hassan, Amin's 19-year-old daughter. He told us that, when it's completed, the archeological garden at the peace centre will be named in her memory.

Dreams dissolve and reality steps in

Theodor Herzl's preposterous notion about the re-emergence of a Jewish state in the remote ancestral Land of Israel was but one more illustration of how the Jewish people does not allow conventional thinking to get in the way of its dreams.

Were Herzl's reveries to remain in the realm of the remotely possible, however, there would have been nothing particularly noteworthy about them. What is absolutely exceptional, if not unique, is that his daring flights of fancy were translated, within two short generations, into a living reality.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

Indeed, one could say that his famous dictum, "If you only want it enough, it will not be a legend," is almost the Jewish national motto. For we have always had an uncanny knack for coaching imaginative possibilities into solid actualities, and it is precisely this mental mix of idealism, dreaminess and practicality that has proven to be a boon to the societies we live in, and to civilization in general.

As the tragedy of disengagement from Gaza unfolded before our eyes, however, and we observed the heart-breaking spectacle of families being wrenched from their homes and the works of their hands and hearts, we awakened to the stark realization that something in the most noble of modern Jewish dreams is seriously amiss. No one would doubt that 150 years of "wanting it enough" have yielded unparalleled achievements. Yet, here, alas, simply wanting something enough was not quite enough. Objective circumstances made a minefield of our dreamscape.

I do not know how history will judge the career and prime ministership of Ariel Sharon. It might well be a complex, many-faceted judgment. If relatively kind in its assessment, it will likely praise his unflagging courage and sense of responsibility when the going got rough, as well as his firm determination to swim against the political stream in order to secure Israel's very survival. And all this only after, late in his political career, he recognized a great peril lurking in the ongoing Palestinian population explosion. The continued existence of Israel as a democratic and free Jewish society was topmost in his considerations.

But in that case, will history not have to also acknowledge that, at the very most, Sharon went a little way toward undoing and reversing a dreadfully bad situation which he himself had done so very much to create in the first place – after his once great dream for his people and his country had darkened into a nightmare?

The allure of dreams, and their potential danger, owe to their not needing to bear any responsibility for themselves. We awaken only to have entire kingdoms dissolve into nothingness. Yet the uninhibited creativity of dreams, when channelled wisely into our waking lives, can enhance creativity, innovation and originality. But if that fuzzy line between dreaming states and waking states becomes blurred, the resulting condition is one of delusions.

The biblical promise of a greater Land of Israel provides our people with a beautiful vision rooted in a distant, irrevocable past. The State of Israel, on the other hand, is a this-worldly political entity that must cope with a given set of inescapable realities.

When the radiant splendour of sacred memories blinds us to the dry facts and figures, which clearly show that we Jews are surely and steadily edging our way toward minority status in the strip of land between the Mediterranean Sea and the Jordan River, the red warning lights ought to be flashing. For before you know it, the threat of rockets and missiles will seem to be nothing compared to the mortal peril to Jewish national life inherent in the simplest arithmetic of numbers.

Personally speaking, the painful spectacle of disengagement – the tearful visages, the demolition of houses, the abandoning of cultivated fields and the long lines of overloaded vehicles on the roads – all have an eerily familiar look. We can only hope that this excruciating experience will serve some day to bring two dispossessed peoples closer together. First, however, we will all have to finish licking our wounds. Then, maybe, a shared hurt born of shattered illusions on both sides will beget an entirely new dream, one that will prove a healing balm.

Canada's contribution to the divestment campaign

While Israelis agonized over the unilateral disengagement process, the political war against Israel escalated in the form of the church-based divestment campaign. In contrast to the optimism expressed by American, European and Canadian officials, these Protestant churches were actively promoting Palestinian victimization and demonizing Israel. Although there are also many Christians who actively support Israel, others are having a poisonous impact.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Divestment is part of the "Durban process" – the strategy proclaimed by many of the participants in the UN-sponsored World Conference Against Racism in September 2001. Under this strategy, Israel is to be painted as "the new apartheid state," and subject to the sanctions and boycotts that were used to dismantle South Africa's apartheid regime. This is a travesty and distorts the victims of the real apartheid, but there are powerful resources behind the campaign.

In order to proceed toward this goal, Palestinian terrorism and corruption are erased, and Israeli responses are branded as "war crimes" and "racism." The divestment resolutions adopted recently by the Anglican Church, the World Council of Churches, the Presbyterian Assembly (USA) and others are all based on this strategy.

From the Durban conference through the failed academic boycott effort, and now divestment, this campaign is being led by pro-Palestinian non-governmental organizations (NGOs). These NGOs use the language of universal human rights and humanitarian relief, but they are primarily extremist political organizations. For example, the divestment texts are taken directly from the pamphlets of a radical Palestinian NGO calling itself the "Sabeel Ecumenical Liberation Theology Center."

Without funds from North America and European "peace groups," Sabeel and other NGOs would hardly be visible. "Friends of Sabeel" chapters are active in many cities, and the Anglican Church of Canada sponsors its fundraising events in Ottawa. In parallel, various groups of volunteers and "peacemaking teams" with no knowledge of regional history, are sent on "study tours to Palestine" to be inundated with tales of Israeli atrocities and Palestinian suffering. On their return, the participants become impassioned advocates in the demonization of Israel, often echoing anti-Semitic themes.

Beyond the active involvement, including funding, provided by affiliated Canadian churches, the government of Canada is also at least an indirect supporter of these activities. The Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) claims that its goal is to "reduce poverty and to contribute to a more secure, equitable and prosperous world." To this end, CIDA, which operates independently of the Department of Foreign Affairs and local embassies, has a budget that exceeds $2 billion.

The Middle East is a central area of CIDA's activities, many of which indeed focus on providing humanitarian relief. However, some of these projects provide large sums to NGOs. These include the Mennonite Central Committee (MCC), Lutheran World Relief, Medecins du Monde and the misnamed Medical Aid for Palestinians. (Using the politicized language of these NGOs, some CIDA references refer erroneously to "occupied Palestinian territory" rather than the Palestinian Authority, or Palestinian areas, or simply projects to assist Palestinians.)

These CIDA-funded NGOs are systematically involved in extremist anti-Israel political efforts, and many have played a role in promoting divestment.

The MCC is closely allied with Sabeel and other Palestinian-based groups, and it reprints their manifestos. MCC's Peace Office Newsletter labelled Israel's security barrier as a "systematic land-grab policy" and predictably erased the environment of terrorism that led to the barrier's construction.

Similarly, Lutheran World Relief's publications repeat the standard allegations of Israel's responsibility for "widespread destruction of buildings and infrastructure," and for policies that "have prevented ambulances from reaching casualties." In June 2002, at the height of the Palestinians' suicide bombing campaign, the Canadian branch issued a press release titled "Palestinian Communities Imprisoned Behind Deep Trenches and Coiled Razor Wire."

And in the winter 2004 edition of Canadian Lutheran World Relief Newsletter, executive director Ruth Jensen published a totally biased attack on Israel's security fence that again erased the background of terror. By grossly distorting events, such reports have prepared the foundations for the divestment campaign.

Funding from the Canadian government and church groups for efforts to promote anti-Israel hatred stands in direct contrast to the claims of promoting peace and human security. Divestment should start at home, by pulling the plug on these programs.

The Kirshner File

Israel faces uncertainty after evacuation

The bloodless evacuation of Jews from the Gaza Strip and the northern West Bank, which brought Israel's 38-year occupation of Gaza to a close and signalled a resounding setback for the settler movement, went faster and smoother than observers had anticipated, thanks in no small part to the professionalism, restraint and sensitivity of Israel's police and army.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

By last week, clanking bulldozers were demolishing the scenic settlements in Gaza, where 230 Israelis have been killed since the 1967 Six Day War. The sight of pretty cottages being pried apart and crushed, the settlers' worst nightmare, was probably the defining image of Israel's groundbreaking disengagement, which is scheduled to be finished by mid or late September.

According to reports, much of the rubble will be used by the Palestinian Authority for high-density housing. The rest will be buried in Gaza and the Sinai Peninsula, which Israel relinquished in the 1980s as part of its historic peace agreement with Egypt.

Israel's imminent withdrawal from Gaza, however, does not portend peace with the Palestinians. This, after all, is a unilateral pullout, and Israel is getting nothing in return from the Palestinians. But it was conceived by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon as a means by which to separate Israel from 1.3 million Palestinians, strengthen Israel's Jewish character, rationalize its defence lines, defuse international pressure on Israel, bolster relations with the United States, reduce daily friction with the Palestinians and encourage Palestinian moderation and a crackdown on terrorism.

Sharon could have – and should have – negotiated the withdrawal with his counterpart, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, and extracted political concessions. But he chose the unilateral route, being convinced that Abbas is weak and that the current Palestinian leadership cannot deliver on solemn promises. Unilateralism also freed Sharon of the obligation of formally locking himself into further withdrawals from the West Bank – the heart and soul of Israel's costly, divisive and highly questionable settlement project.

Still, two weeks ago, Sharon suggested that more pullouts might be possible. But as settlers quietly left Netzarim, the last outpost in Gaza to be abandoned and the target of countless terrorist attacks, which claimed the lives of 17 Israeli soldiers, he veered to the right. He vowed to expand West Bank settlement blocs and maintain Israel's grip on Ariel – the biggest Jewish enclave after Ma'ale Adumim – and he issued orders to seize 60 square kilometres of land to build a section of the security barrier around Ma'ale Adumim.

Sharon's mixed message threw the Palestinians into a frenzy of uncertainty. They do not know whether Gaza was his first and last withdrawal, and they will have to wait until after the next election, which may be called sooner rather than later, to divine his true intentions.

In the meantime, Abbas, who will face the Palestinian electorate on Jan. 25, faces immense challenges.

He wants to stabilize Gaza and hold it up as a model of Palestinian governance, but if he cannot maintain peace and quiet after Israel's withdrawal, he will play into the hands of Israeli hardliners. Already under intense criticism from his own party for uprooting 25 settlements, Sharon will surely halt further withdrawals if Palestinian militants fire rockets and mortars at the remaining West Bank settlements and into Israel itself.

The Palestinians, having hailed the disengagement from Gaza as the end result of their armed uprising, may yet be tempted to try to "liberate" the West Bank by "blood and fire." Although Abbas himself ascribed the looming pullout to the efforts of Palestinian "martyrs," he opposes such tactics in practice and thinks that the militarization of the intifadah was an egregious mistake.

But more bloodshed may be in store for Israel and the Palestinians. Israel's director of military intelligence, Gen. Aharon Ze'evi, has warned that Palestinian militias are building up their strength in the West Bank, with its 118 Jewish settlements, for a possible new offensive in the near future. Fresh violence will doubtless erupt if Sharon assumes control of Gaza's border crossings, indicates that the era of withdrawals has ended and states that the "road map" peace plan, which envisages a two-state solution, will not be implemented.

Certainly, radical groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad, which have taken a leading role in the suicide bombing campaign against Israel since 2001 and have gained more popularity since then, are gearing up for another round of hostilities. Mahmoud Zahar, Hamas' supreme leader, declared as much recently. His objective, an Islamic state in place of Israel, clashes with Abbas' goal of a sovereign state encompassing the West Bank and Gaza, with eastern Jerusalem as its capital.

Although the second intifadah was a factor in Sharon's painful decision to vacate Gaza and four isolated settlements in the West Bank, Abbas realizes that a new surge of violence may be counter-productive.

This sober assessment is disputed by Palestinians such as Khaled Mashaal, a Hamas leader who was targeted for assassination by the Mossad in Amman in 1997. He has interpreted Israel's forthcoming Gaza pullout as a harbinger of its eventual defeat. But his analysis is deeply flawed. He obviously misunderstands the attachment of Israelis to their land within the 1967 borders.

Most Israelis support the disengagement, considering Gaza as an albatross that should have been shucked off years ago. Yet Mashaal and his ilk confuse territorial compromise with national weakness. Palestinians like Mashaal imagine that Israel is ripe for the plucking. They are dreaming, labouring under a grand illusion that may cost the Palestinians statehood.

The mainly Orthodox Jewish settlers of Gaza, as well as their sympathizers in Israel and abroad, were also myopic. Having fallen under the thrall of messianism, they were convinced that a "miracle" would save their communities in the sands of Gaza. To cite an example, one Jewish farmer in Netzarim planted a new cherry tomato crop prior to the evacuation.

To be completely fair to the settlers, they were encouraged to set down roots in Gaza – where 57 per cent of attacks during the second intifadah took place – by a succession of Israeli governments, including Sharon's.

They were drawn to Gaza by religious zealotry, appeals to patriotism, tax breaks, affordable housing and the prospect of cleaner air and a better quality of life – precisely the reasons why Jews have flocked to the West Bank in droves.

In the final analysis, the settlement of Gaza failed because it did not attract a critical mass of Jewish settlers to justify its permanent retention by Israel. Gaza's Jewish population was just too small, consisting of islands of Jews in a Muslim sea, and therefore, the settlers there were politically dispensable.

The majority of settlers left their homes before the Aug.15 deadline. But before pulling up stakes, they sold their greenhouses for a tidy sum and qualified for compensation payments up to $500,000 (US). These funds will go a long way to assuage their anger and anguish.

But a noisy ideological minority of about 4,000 was not impressed by the generous financial incentives and put up a theatrical show of defiance. They were joined by some 5,000 mainly Orthodox infiltrators from the West Bank, including so-called hilltop youth, who haughtily reject government authority and can accurately be described as outside agitators who were fighting to preserve their own settlements.

The diehards, influenced by seditious rabbis who urged soldiers to flaunt their orders, resisted fiercely. They hurled curses, shamefully equating the evacuation with Nazi deportations and comparing Sharon to Hitler. They blocked military convoys and entrances to settlements. They burned tires and vandalized trucks and earth-moving machines. They engaged in fisticuffs with police and troops. They doused them with paint, cooking oil, human waste, ketchup, vinegar and acid. They pelted them with eggs.

These skirmishes caused more than 100 injuries, but it could have been much worse. The traumatic confrontations neither boiled into really serious violence nor touched off a civil war, as some had rashly predicted.

But the evacuations, which were completed in only six days, exposed troubling rifts in Israeli society, fissures between law-abiding and extremist Israelis. Many of the Jewish fundamentalists, who were under 30, airily dismiss such intrinsic democratic concepts as the rule of law. They have isolated themselves as dangerous malcontents who are divorced from reality and have nothing but contempt for secular Israelis.

Israel's deputy minister for Diaspora affairs, Rabbi Michael Melchior, has correctly pointed out that the propensity of Jewish radicals to identify messianic nationalism and religious fundamentalism with Judaism is a recipe for disaster.

Catering chair Alan Marks said there was "extensive damage."

The sewers backed up with the enormous amounts of water and caused flooding. This has since rendered the whole lower floor of the synagogue completely unusable, he said.

Renovations have begun with the drywall and carpeting being ripped out to help with the drying process.

In the interim though, celebrations and events at the synagogue continue. In order to accommodate a bar mitzvah that was booked for one of the downstairs banquet halls, the synagogue rented a tent and pitched it in the the parking lot so that the bar mitzvah could go ahead.

Repairs to the synagogue are expected to take three to four weeks.

Aish HaTorah in Thornhill escaped with minimal damage, according to Sharon Hyman, logistics and facilities co-ordinator.

She noted that there was water damage on the lower level and some of the drywall would have to be ripped out and replaced, but there was no damage to the shul itself.

"We were very fortunate," she said.

Synagogues were not the only buildings affected by the storm. Steeles Memorial Chapel suffered some damage to its building, but a spokesperson said the funeral home was fortunate under the circumstances, since the only repair that would be needed would be to replace their carpets.

The Jewish day schools did not escape the water either.

Elias Levy, executive director of Eitz Chaim Day Schools, said there seems to have been minimal damage to the campuses, but "we're not sure yet. When it comes to water, one doesn't always know of the damage immediately."

Netivot Hatorah Day School in Thornhill did not escape quite so easily. Executive director Alan Steinfeld said that although the exact damage was still being assessed, the school's ground floor was quite extensively flooded. However, he added that they seemed to have escaped any serious damage and that the school should be in pretty good shape for the start of the year.

At Leo Baeck Day School, also in Thornhill, the storm drains burst and there were 3½ feet of water in the lower floor of the building.

Everything on that floor, including the corridors, was destroyed. The lower gym and science laboratory will need to be repaired and the equipment in both replaced. Since all the walls were drywall, those too will have to be replaced, and in one of the classrooms, the ceiling came down and all the materials in that room will need to be replaced.

"We had no loss of life or human injury and that's the main thing. All the damage is stuff that builders can put right," said David Prashker, director of the school.

He also noted they were lucky that they did not lose their computer room.

In addition to the water damage, the storm produced a lot of mud that not only covered much of the lower level of the Leo Baeck building but also came into a mikvah that is housed on the school's property.

"This has certainly been an exciting time for us," said Prashker. "Fortunately this happened two weeks before the start of school, and so we anticipate that we will be ready for action by the start of the school term."

Insurance adjusters contacted report that an estimated 4,500 homeowners, 50 businesses and 500 vehicle owners across the GTA filed claims following the storm.

Other Jewish centres in the GTA were also damaged by the storm. The CJN was not able to reach all those affected.

Rabbi Scheim to be honoured at Beth David's jubilee

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

As summer comes to a close, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am has two reasons to celebrate.

On Sept. 15, the synagogue hosts its 50th jubilee and honours Rabbi Philip Scheim as he celebrates the milestone of having spent 25 years with the congregation.

Along with a gala that includes dinner, dancing and live entertainment, a special Saturday service with the jubilee theme will be held that week as well.

"We are planning a special Saturday morning service and a very enhanced Kiddush for the congregation, which is completely free. We want to make this a celebration that the entire membership can participate in," said Miriam Telem, the shul's executive director.

"We're going to have special archives and artifacts and photos displayed for a few months. Different historical items will be in display windows," she added.

While the proceeds from the tickets will be used to "enhance the synagogue" and "beautify the sanctuary," Telem also sees this event as a perfect way to honour Rabbi Scheim, who has been with a congregation that grew very attached to him when he was a young man 25 years ago.

"Rabbi Scheim came here as a young guy, fresh out of rabbinical school," Telem said. "He came as the assistant rabbi and, unfortunately, our senior rabbi [Albert Pappenheim] died a few years later. The congregation loved and respected Rabbi Scheim so much that they appealed to the authorities of the larger body, the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, because according to their guidelines, you have to be a rabbi 'x' number of years in a junior position before you can become a senior rabbi of a congregation of this size."

She said the congregation, which comprises about 1,200 families, didn't want another rabbi they didn't know, because they had already grown to love and trust Rabbi Scheim.

"There was special dispensation to make him senior rabbi at a very young age."

Rabbi Scheim recalled the circumstances that lead him to become only the second spiritual guide at Beth David.

"[Rabbi Pappenheim] passed away 2½ years into my tenure, and the congregation chose to elevate me, which wasn't as simple as it sounds because it was against rabbinical assembly policy as I was too young to assume a congregation of this size. I didn't have the requisite experience and they actually changed the policy based on my case," the rabbi said.

Because of Rabbi Scheim's case, the assembly changed the required 10 years' experience to six as they realized it wasn't realistic to tell a congregation that had a relationship with the assistant rabbi that he had to leave if the senior rabbi retired, or in his case, passed away, he said.

"I guess I managed to meet expectations. I'm still here," Rabbi Scheim joked.

Telem added, "He definitely grew in the role and the congregation is very attached to him. He is a brilliant orator. We get lots of requests for his sermons on Monday mornings."

Telem hopes to honour Rabbi Scheim by using a part of the proceeds of the jubilee to publish a volume of his sermons.

The modest Rabbi Scheim, apparently uncomfortable in the spotlight, said, "I would have been very comfortable in celebrating the congregation's 50th anniversary by just being there.

"It's not my priority to be honoured because my personality is on the quiet side. Although my occupation sometimes thrusts me into the centre of attention, that's not my nature."

Still, he is excited for the opportunity to celebrate with a congregation that has become his family.

"Life so often gives us challenges and crises and it is so important to find reasons to celebrate," he said.

With 600 people and counting confirmed to attend, Beth David will not be able to accommodate such a large crowd. The jubilee, initiated Alex Eisen and Stan Goldfarb, the co-chairs, will be held at the Venetian Banquet Hall in Vaughan.

Jewish Life

We are moon people

By RABBI MORDECAI E. ZEITZ

While the history of most of modern civilization is recorded according to a time schedule based on the sun's rotation around the earth, Jewish time is based upon the moon.

As we anticipate the celebration of Rosh Chodesh, Elul, and the start of the final month of the year, we note that the day coincides with the world emerging from darkness. For the past week or so, the moon seemed to disappear and the heavens were dark. Then, in olden times by physical witness and in our times by mathematical calculation, a "new moon" is sighted and a new month is declared.

Our day starts with the appearance of the moon at sundown, our months are calculated according to the moon and our years are an accumulation of a sequence of moon-recorded events. We are a moon people. Our history is recorded in moon years and is a reflection of the moon.

To my mind, the beginning of every Jewish month is not a "new" moon but rather a "renewed" moon that represents not only Jewish survival but also Jewish thriving. Throughout the ages, we have faced challenges of unbelievable darkness. Displacement, expulsion, isolation and near annihilation – all these plus so much more are the dark clouds that hover over the pages of Jewish history.

But our response to these trials is not a "new" moon or a new light. We found the strength and the creativity to "renew" what we had and make it even stronger. It was hard and frustrating finding direction and creating renewed beginnings in the midst of terrible darkness. When much of the world at times collectively schemed to extinguish our Jewish light, we renewed our vision and our visibility time and time again.

Well, we are not "moon people" for nothing. That is the Jewish reality and we do not bemoan the fact but rather celebrate our ability to renew our communities, to renew our commitment to life and create continuing dramatic and unbelievable chapters of Jewish accomplishment, time after time. As a people and as individuals, we emerge from the dark experiences we face with a renewed light of determination and optimism.

How many individuals have overcome illness, business reversals, family crises and the like, by simply not becoming victims of the darkness of human disillusionment and frustration? We are in the midst of a dark and heart-wrenching period of Jewish history. There is pain on all sides.

And so comes the renewed light of the month of Elul, no ordinary month. Elul could stand for ani ledodi v'dodi li – I am for my beloved and my beloved is for me, the true renewed enlightenment of care and respect for every person regardless of our difference of opinion. To feel the pain of my brother as if it was my pain; to feel the sense of betrayal and isolation of my sister as if it was my own. To feel the impossible position of the members of the Israel Defence Forces, torn between their loyalty to the State of Israel and their own human feelings. To feel the abuse heaped upon so many of them and to take pride in the genuine tears shed on all sides.

We desperately need a "renewed moon" of unity and mutual respect. That has been our hallmark; that has been our salvation. As we close out this difficult year, let us make the true meaning of Elul the foundation of the coming new year.

Rabbi Mordecai E. Zeitz is spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Tikvah in Montreal.

The merits of healthy debate

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

A man is hunched underneath a bright street lamp, apparently searching for a valuable object he has lost. He is approached by a police officer who inquires if the man is certain that this is the place where he misplaced his prized possession. The man replies, "No, I lost it way over there" and he points into the distance. "If that's the case," the puzzled police officer asks, "then why are you searching here?" The man looks up and says, "Oh, because the light is better here."

This anecdote is quoted by the writer John Williamson to indicate the danger in the manipulation of all data to fit a preconceived theory. The joke, which Williamson tells in reference to Noam Chomsky – draw your own conclusions – is actually quite telling for Jewish education. Do those who step forward to convey Judaism to students keep themselves open to the nuances of the textual and historical record of Judaism, or do they simply look to stuff all issues into neatly predetermined slots with little regard for the complexity of that record?

Two different models can be cited in this regard, what one might call the vertical versus the horizontal approach to teaching. In the vertical style, the "truth" is conveyed from on high, with the teacher regally dispatching his or her information, not to be sidetracked by something so diverting as a challenging question or a discrepancy or contradiction in the presentation.

By contrast, a horizontal philosophy sees the teacher and student on a shared quest for wisdom, in which the difficulties of the material are attacked from many angles, and there remains the endless possibility of a fresh insight or entrance to even the most sacred text.

The vertical mode reflects a much deeper problem in the end, that of fear, and thus rejection, of all views that are not in accordance with one's own. Though that way heralds spiritual and intellectual stagnation, it is a much-frequented path these days.

But from the perspective of the Maharal of Prague, it is a destructive position to adapt, and not in keeping with the Jewish way. At the end of his magisterial work Be'er ha-Golah, the Maharal delivers a manifesto of religious courage and shrewdness: "One who causes his opponent to hold his peace and refrain from speaking, thus demonstrates the weakness of his own religious faith. This is therefore the opposite of what some people think, namely, that when you prevent someone from speaking against religion, that strengthens religion. That is not so, because curbing the words of an opponent in religious matters is nothing but the curbing and enfeebling of religion."

What is remarkable about this passage, quoted by Rabbi Norman Lamm in his Torah Umadda, is that the Maharal is even willing to extend the olive branch of open discourse to those who not only disagree with his particular religious view, but actually deny Torah per se. And his reasons for this attitude are plain: "Religion is given to all."

If the ultimate goal is to persuade others of your point of view, this can only be done where dialogue is not throttled, but rather carried to its natural limits. As would later be emphasized by Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, such argumentation, even between diametrically opposed views, leads to the purification of religion and the sanctification of God.

Jewish Life

Who's listening?

Books
Bernard Baskin

Martin Buber, who died in 1965, was a renowned philosopher, religionist and author. He was visited one day by a university student with a serious personal problem. Not long after their meeting, the young man committed suicide.

Buber was guilt-stricken. He realized that he had only partially listened, or perhaps more accurately, had listened only with his ears. He had not involved himself sufficiently in the situation. He had failed to hear the unspoken cries for help because he had not listened with his whole being.

Later, in his groundbreaking book I and Thou, he wrote, "This is what I mean by religion – not removing yourself into another world, but responding to the call that comes into your everyday life. Above all, listening to both the silent and the spoken voices when one person speaks to another, so that together they can remove the barriers between two human beings."

Anatomically speaking, we are so constructed that we should devote more time listening than to speaking. The divine architect endowed us with two ears but only one mouth. Yet for most of us the mouth is a sorely overworked organ and the ears are in a state of semi-retirement.

We desperately need someone with whom to share our burdens, our fears and loneliness, our yearnings and our frustrations, our guilts and our hostilities. We need someone to release us from the isolation cell into which we are so frequently manoeuvred because no one cares enough to liberate us with a sympathetic ear. In short, we are all in search of the person who has developed the fine art of listening.

One of life's mysteries that never cease to astonish me is the tendency of the human mind to distort and misinterpret the message received through the ear. Whenever someone informs me, "Rabbi, I enjoyed that sermon, or that speech, and I am going to tell my friends all about it," I begin to worry. Just what will be transmitted? My words are now beyond my control, and subject to all kinds of misinterpretation and distortion.

Tests, conducted by Queen's University, showed that, on the average, people listen to only about half of what they hear. This means that during a 20-minute lecture they hear about 30,000 words and listen to only about half of them – which half I've never been able to figure out.

How will we understand the problems of conflicting minorities until we learn to sit down and listen to what each group has to say? Would not international talks proceed more positively if instead of shouting at one another, both sides would take turns really listening to one another? Would not many of the stresses of family life be lessened if the members of the family took the time to hear each other? In our private lives how important it is to have one friend who can listen to us as we confide our troubles, and thereby lighten our burdens. And if we want to have such a friend, we must also be a friend who is willing to listen.

When God appeared to youthful King Solomon in a vision in the night and offered him any gift he wished, the monarch asked for neither power nor wealth, nor glory. He asked instead for a "listening heart." It is a gift worth cultivating. For ultimately, true listening is not done with the ears. It is done with the heart.

Rashi's 900th yahrzeit

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This year marks the yahrzeits of two of the greatest luminaries of Jewish thought and interpretation. Rashi, the author of the premier Torah commentary passed away 900 years ago and the Rambam, the famed codifier, philosopher and physician, passed away 800 years ago.

The works of these two giants are fundamental to our understanding of Tanach, Gemarah and how to conduct our daily lives. For centuries, the traditional way to study their writings has been by poring over a sefer, a Jewish book. I don't think that tradition is going to change anytime soon. However, the Internet does present an incredible resource to understand these men's lives, works and insights. This week, a look at Rashi online; next week the Rambam.

Rabbi Shlomo Yitzchaki (Rashi) was born in Troyes, France, in 1040. His commentaries are indispensable to any scholar – beginner or advanced – attempting to understand the Torah and Talmud. You can learn much more about his life, accomplishments and remarkable family through the links provided by the Department for Jewish Zionist Education. [www.jafi.org.il/education/history/rashi.html]

The best commemorative site that I found can be credited to Pittsburgh's Gerald Meyer. As reported in the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, Meyer had heard about events honouring Rashi to be held in France but nothing closer to home. Along with Jewish.com, he created Rashi900.com, a wonderful website that includes a biography, links to other Rashi resources, including the entire contents of the book Rashi, a biography published by the Jewish Publication Society of America to mark the 800th anniversary of Rashi's yahrzeit in 1905. [http://rashi900.com/]

When you open a tractate of Talmud, you can immediately see the honoured place that the Rashi commentary is accorded. Eliezer Segal's wonderful Page of Talmud, deconstructs the structure of a page of Talmud and explains how the various commentators are situated surrounding the Mishnah and Gemarah found at the centre. Notice that Rashi's commentary is always accorded the special position on the inside of the page closest to the binding. [www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/TalmudPage.html]

Students of Rashi are universally struck by how concise, perhaps even terse, his commentary can be. In order to understand Rashi on a deeper level (and "what's bothering Rashi"), you need to understand his logic and methodology. The RashiYomi site provides several essays on "Rashi Rules," as well as a Rashi Rule Workbook. [http://rashiyomi.com/]

The best way to learn Rashi is from a printed text, but if you don't happen to have a Chumash handy, it's good to know that an English translation of everything Rashi wrote is as accessible at a computer with an Internet connection. You can look up any chapter in the Torah to see any of Rashi's 8,000 interpretations in English and see the corresponding Torah verse in Hebrew. [http://rashiyomi.com/query1.htm]

Chabad.org does a nice job of laying out all of Rashi's commentary alongside an English translation of the Torah. [www.chabad.org/article.html?AID=9175] And if you would like to do a Rashi keyword search throughout the entire Torah, go to this search engine. [www.tachash.org/texis/vtx/chumash]

I couldn't find an online version of Rashi's commentary of the Torah in Hebrew aside from a commercial version that you can download to your Palm. [www.eurocool.com/language/?language=Hebrew] If you know of a free one, please e-mail me.

Any budding scholar who thinks back to his or her first Rashi lesson may remember being confronted by the unfamiliar, cursive alphabet used for printing his commentary, the so-called "Ktav Rashi" or "Rashi script." As Herb Basser explains, "Rashi script is in fact a common ordinary Sephardic script for Hebrew used by Sephardic scribes all through the middle ages. When printers needed to distinguish between the commentary text and the biblical text itself, they choose the Sephardic script type." [http://tinyurl.com/ckcge]

In a short online video, Robert Harris, who teaches a course about Rashi at the Jewish Theological Institute, laments that fewer people are learning how to read this beautiful font. [http://learn.jtsa.edu/topics/diduknow/rashi/]

While you're at the JTS site, you can hone your Ktav Rashi skills with the "Rashi Letters Game." Your challenge: drag and drop the Rashi script letters on top of the familiar Hebrew letters. Every time you make a successful match, a picture of Rashi yells "Yahoo!" – a word that I believe was not part of the standard Old French vocabulary in the 11th century.

New CHAT principal focuses on 'positive learning environment'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Helen Fox, incoming principal of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, says she'd like to believe every problem has a solution.

"I've been called naive on that one," she admitted in an interview in her new office, which she took over from Sheldon Friedman on his retirement. Fox, whose smile underscores her words, prefers to think of herself as an optimist.

"With students, I'd like to believe there needs to be enough flexibility to create as positive a learning environment as possible, because ultimately that's our goal."

A child of Holocaust survivors who was born and raised in Toronto, Fox always knew she wanted to be a teacher. The longtime educator, who began her career as a family studies teacher in 1972, joined CHAT's 850-student Tanenbaum campus last year as vice principal, general studies. As a teacher, she also specialized in computers and geography.

Most recently, she served as assistant principal and acting principal at the University of Toronto Schools, a private school for high-achieving students. Before that, from 1997 to 2000, she was a vice principal at Earl Haig Collegiate.

CHAT, she feels, provides an opportunity to synthesize the experience she gained at the private and public schools. Although CHAT is a private Jewish school, "it is also open to all Jewish kids, and in that sense it's very public."

As an administrator, Fox says she leads "collegially, rather than top-down... It's a way of making sure people understand the reasons behind the decisions." Metaphorically, she explained, she wants to have "everybody on the train, and we'll take the journey together."

In the spring, Fox initiated a mentoring program for new teachers, including shlichim from Israel. In line with her administrative philosophy, she now sits on the program committee, but does not actually lead it.

The mentoring program also serves as her year-long research project – the follow-up to a conference for Jewish day school administrators she attended this summer in Israel. Her participation in the conference, she said, has helped her to enrich the program.

Helen Fox, CHAT's new principal, has initiated a mentoring program for new teachers, including shlichim from Israel.

The mentoring program is designed to help teachers learn the culture of the school, decrease or prevent feelings of isolation, and handle any unfamiliar tasks, including what to do when they have to call in sick.

Fox is delighted that it was a staff member who suggested matching up teachers from the general studies program with those from the Jewish studies program where possible.

Having had no experience with CHAT before last year – her four grown children attended other day schools when they were younger – Fox has found "an enormous warmth and togetherness. From the moment I arrived, staff, parents and students gave me a sense of welcome."

She sees her role at the school as "key learner," leader and partner. "Part of my role is to create a balance. If any part of the triangle [made up of kids, parents and the school] is out of balance, it doesn't work well."

HARTLEY J. LICHTBLAU – 1965-2004

My Dearest Hartley,

As a 2 year old, I approached my responsibilities as an older sister to my new baby brother quite seriously. I was going to share with you, Hartley, the ways of the world, for even at the tender age of 2, I had already developed and accumulated quite the life resumé: mastering the art of getting attention at whim, feigning remorse to avoid spankings, and acquiring Tam Tams at will. I would divulge all to you alone, my baby brother. I would protect you from all of life's evils – the AC outlet, the deep end of the JCC pool, and fried liver with onions. And I would inspire you with arcane wisdom drawing upon my extensive Sesame Street education. I vowed to teach you, protect you, and care for you forever and for always because I was the big sister and that's what big sisters do. Of course, the reality was that through the years it became I who, so often, looked to you, my baby brother, for protection, for compassion, and to learn, not simply about life, but about living meaningfully.

In your quiet unassuming ways you taught me so much, but mostly, you taught me about the essence of loving. How is it that your love was so naturally unconditional? Through you, Hartley, I gained the understanding of how true love was not only boundless, but without judgment. You procured love with the understanding that loving with expectation or provision was certainly no love at all. Your love was always so pure and so selfless.

Through you, Hartley, I learnt the meaning of integrity. In a world that imposes inflated significance on materialism and acquisitions, you could eschew the superficial and steadfastly maintain self-imposed convictions. While the world around you valued all that was manufactured, ephemeral, and plastic, your morés and identity were grounded in a bedrock of simplicity, humility, and substance.

This lack of pretension made you vulnerable to those who consistently chose to judge and subjugate others with no intent other than to amplify their own egos. But your acute perception of and compassion for the human spirit gifted you the ability to see beyond the malignance that they evoked. You recognized that what others would construe as ill-willed or malevolence was most often manifested not from a base of perversity, but rather, and simply, from the most nascent of human weaknesses and frailties. As such, you extended grace and tenderheartedness to their needy souls and in doing so taught me that understanding and forgiveness are, indeed, divine.

Immeasurable was the esteem you held for our parents. I envied your inexorable respect for daddy, never faltering in your duties as a son, never wavering in your commitment to your father. And as for mommy, for the remainder of her life she can linger in the enchant of having been elevated to the status of a queen, solely because of her son, Hartley, who, like no other, designated her royalty and embraced her as such everyday of her life.

Do you even know how many lives you touched, how many destinies were altered, the empty hearts reinvigorated all because of you, my Hartley? With your kind gestures, the profundity of your words, with your hearty laughter, your silly jokes, and your compassionate gaze, so little evoked so much: the campers who rejoiced in your summer camp expeditions; your fatherless "little brother" Bram who, with you by his side, became a man of self worth; the adoration and special kinship you shared with Sam and Rose; the numerous wayward juveniles whom you counseled and guided; the inimitable brotherly bond shared with Mark Kafka; your special connect to the misguided, the needy, the disenfranchised.

And then there was me.

I shroud myself in the memories of you. They give me strength when I'm unsure; they protect me during moments of insecurity; they make me smile when I'm saddened; they give me perspective when I'm overwhelmed. And I drudge forward, clumsily attempting to maintain your legacy, hearing your whispers guide me. It gives me both focus and comfort. And it keeps you alive. Yet, in spite of all my efforts to embrace all the memories of you, what was most invaluable has eluded me since you've left because how exactly does a sister ever replace the "bestest" hugs in the whole world. She can't.

Our lives, separately and together, were not without their challenges. I watched you confront yours with courage and dignity always. And throughout the worst of times, I witnessed your valiant battle to live your life righteously and with propriety. You were mensche, you were goodness, you were a ne'shemah until the end. Ironically, that intangible last moment between life and death, your last heartbeat, that final breath, might possibly have been the only honest moment in your life that you ever allowed for just yourself.

So while your life filled my heart, it is your death that has empowered my soul. Your tragic death was not in vain nor without redemption. For while memories and your life lessons are well cherished, it is through your death that you have taught me the truth and the essence of "living meaningfully". And I continue to learn, Hartley. This I promise.

I realize that you would have resisted such a tribute, having always avoided anything that could have platformed your humbled self. I don't apologize. With all my love, with all my respect, with all my adoration, and with all my regret for what I couldn't do for you, this I could. And I do so because that's what big sisters do.

Love you eternally, Rena

Pontypool homecoming planned for September 14

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Years ago, when you wanted to escape the heat, noise, crowds and humidity of downtown Toronto, you'd pack up the family, head down to Union Station and take the train out of town. If you ended up at Pontypool, as did thousands of Jews in the 1930s, '40s and '50s, you'd probably while away the long summer days, sitting on the beach, playing cards and looking forward to the next big meal on offer at any of the local resorts.

Back in those heady days, Pontypool was like a magnet to the blue collar Jews who lived in Kensington Market, enticed by the lure of a cooler climate and a haymishe environment.

Thousands made it their home away from home each summer and on Sept. 14, the Manvers Township Historical Society hosts a reunion and homecoming at the Nimigon Memorial Park Pontypool for those who once vacationed in the village. The homecoming marks the 100th anniversary of the arrival of the first Jewish family in Pontypool, that of Moishe Yukle Bernstein, who would go on to acquire a local farm and turn it into a rudimentary summer resort.

The event will feature a reception, the rededication of the founders stone of the Pontypool Jewish Community Centre, a photo exhibit of cottage days and, of course, the chance to mingle and relive old times.

Doris Manetta, a native of Pontypool who is helping organize the event, said news of the reunion has "touched so many people. My phone's been ringing off the hook. I can't believe how emotionally attached people are to these memories."

Manetta's recollection of Pontypool goes back to the 1940s when she was a little girl. Her family was one of several that ran local resorts in Pontypool. Unlike the other Jewish entrepreneurs, her family remained in the village year round.

Moishe Yukle Bernstein was her grandfather and she credits him with "starting the ball rolling with cottages at Pontypool."

In 1914, he bought a farm in the area, and he used it to bring European Jews into Canada as farm labourers. It was a way of getting around the quota on Jewish immigrants, she said, adding most would leave Pontypool and drift to the Jewish community in Kensington Market.

To get relief from the market's heat and crowds, many headed back to Pontypool, where Moishe Yukle had opened "simple, shtetl-like cottages, with a communal kitchen and basic food."

Around 1925, her grandmother's family, the Crystals, began their own resort business. Around 1936, Manetta's mom started her own resort with meal service on a farm next door to her grandfather's place.

"It was a nice, economic place to get out of the city heat. Everybody was related, so everybody came out," Manetta said.

Located at the high edge of the Oak Ridges Moraine northeast of Toronto, Pontypool's elevation provided coolish summer nights.

CP trains ran to Pontypool twice a day and the ride took an hour and a half to two hours. In the high season, a midnight express also made the run.

Generally, women and children spent the week while husbands would catch the Friday train for the weekend,. The train shipped kosher food for the weekends on Thursday.

The tiny village of Pontypool, whose population was only around 150, would swell on summer weekends to at least 2,000, Manetta recalled.

They stayed at the Bernstein Cottages or at the resorts run by the Crystal, Manetta, Lofchick and White families. Other families ran smaller facilities.

Pontypool was in its heyday in the 1940s when Saturday night dances were packed, the dining rooms were full for several seatings and the beach and the Crystals' pool were crowded, Manetta said.

For entertainment, poker and mahjong games were particularly popular with the older crowd, while youngsters headed to the beach or shot pool and listened to the jukebox at the Pontypool hotel, run by the Miller family. Sometimes the teenagers would walk up the street singing pop tunes of the day.

A highlight Manetta recalls was the corn, wiener and marshmallow roasts offered by resort owners.

Although the Jewish vacationers experienced some anti-Semitism, relations with the local population were generally good, Manetta said. Not only did the vacationers boost the local economy, but the area already had a multicultural feel, with Irish, Scottish and Slavic residents sharing the area with the Jewish holidayers.

Pontypool's popularity started to decline in the 1950s as the Kensington Jews started to leave the market area and purchase homes uptown. Around the same time, they began sending their kids to summer camp, while many families could now afford more upscale holiday accommodations. Pontypool's attraction waned and by the early '60s the familiar Pontypool summers were a thing of the past.

The old cottages and resorts have been gentrified and today the area looks like any other subdivision. Still, the reunion will harken back to a time that many Pontypool vacationers will remember fondly, Manetta said.

Chen Kupperman has no illusions that he is missing out on true university life, as well as normal 14-year-old life, "but I can't make myself older or my math ability less," he says. [Benji Feldman photo]

14-year-old Israeli studies math at York U

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

Israeli Chen Kupperman is a student at York University in his second year as an undergraduate mathematics major.

Doesn't seem too unusual, except that by the time he completes his undergraduate degree in two years, this 14-year-old will just have reached the age when he can legally drive in Canada.

"I am grateful to York for accepting me for my mathematical ability and not seeing my age as an obstacle," he said.

Looking ahead, Chen sees himself as a mathematics professor. Though he could well reach doctoral level before even leaving his teens, he is sure that he doesn't want math to be his entire life.

From the age of six, Chen wanted a career in math, and when he was 11, he decided that he was ready to take the final high school examination in the subject.

The Israeli education ministry refused to let him take the exam due to his age, so the Kupperman family went to the Israeli Supreme Court, hoping to change legislation not only for their son but also for other children like him.

In the end, the court did not make a firm ruling on the matter and only suggested that the ruling be changed. Although Kupperman was permitted to take the exam – at the age of 12 – other families will still have to fight this battle.

At the time of the court battle, the Jerusalem Post reported that "Kupperman first displayed his extraordinary talent at the age of two, when he pointed out to his mother that the television channel display counted in groups of 10.

"At age three, he began reading newspapers and once complained of a spelling mistake in the name of the famous physicist on the Rehov Einstein street sign in his home town of Haifa."

After Chen scored 99 per cent on the examination, the next challenge for the Kuppermans was getting their son into a university or college.

The Technion accepted him, but the ministry of education limited his university-level studies to one course each semester. "They were only allowing him to do his degree in such a way that he would be finished in 20 years," said Sara, Chen's mother.

The Kuppermans were growing angrier and more disillusioned every day.

Their light at the end of the tunnel came in the form of York University.

Ma'ariv online newspaper wrote an article about Chen and one of the notes posted by a reader was "come to us," with a link to the university's website.

Chen filled out the application forms, submitted them and within two days had been accepted. His age had not factored into the university's decision.

However, this meant that the Kuppermans were forced to leave a comfortable and settled life in Israel and come to Toronto so that Chen could continue his education. "A year ago, we all moved because Chen is a minor and can't live by himself," said Shachar, Chen's father.

At the moment, they are living a double life. "We have one home here and one in Israel, one car here and one in Israel and so on," Chen added.

In addition, his parents are not able to work in Canada, so that the time they spend here is eating away at their savings.

Although Chen is now able to study at a level matching his mathematical ability, he says, "I didn't want to leave Israel. I have my friends there and my life there and everything."

He has become friendly with some of his co-university students, but says, "In Canada, the people I have become a bit friendly with are old and, come on, I'm still 14 years old. I'm can't drive and so am not the cool guy with the car and I can't, and don't want, to drink."

Chen, who plays the piano and recorder in his spare time and is a volunteer teacher assistant at the "Spirit of Math" school for gifted math students, says that the professors and students at York have accepted him and see his mathematical ability rather than his age.

"At first, they looked at me and thought I was a small 20-year-old, but when I tell them my age they look at me a bit but don't care," he said.

"Or at least they don't show it," Shachar joked.

Chen has no illusions that he is missing out on true university life, as well as normal 14-year-old life, "but I can't make myself older or my math ability less," he says.

For the moment, he is at York until at least the end of his first degree and he has nothing but praise for the university.

His father says, "They thought out of the box and found any way they could to help Chen."

Chen has been able to adapt easily to different situations, so that although he misses Israel, he is able to persevere and work hard at York.

"Chen is a very responsible person and whatever he decides to do, he puts everything into and does," said Sara.

GG designate Michaëlle Jean speaks out on multiculturalism

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

Governor general designate Michaëlle Jean doesn't beat about the bush when she talks about multiculturalism, one of the cardinal values of Canada's social system.

Michaëlle Jean

The television journalist for Radio-Canada, CBC's French-language network, was highly critical of Canadian multiculturalism during a round table discussion on the future of Quebec society, which was held April 4 at FEDERATION CJA and organized by the Institut du Judaïsme québécois. Three other veteran francophone Quebec journalists also participated in the panel: Carole Beaulieu, editor-in-chief of L'Actualité magazine; Pierre Thibeault, editor-in-chief of the weekly Ici; and Josée Legault, a columnist with the English daily, the Gazette.

"Citizenship is living together," Jean said. "We will probably not agree on this, but does our multiculturalism truly mean living together? We are even given the financial means to allow each of us to live in our own enclosure, a kind of 'ghettoization' that is funded for us. Yet, multiculturalism is offered as a founding model for Canada."

Jean reproached the organizations and leaders of our cultural communities for exploiting multiculturalism.

"In these cultural communities, there are organizations and leaders who take advantage of multiculturalism for their own ends. It's awful when you think about it. What I truly dream of is a much more solid thinking about citizenship, about a belonging that does not negate the place we came from, our heritage, whether we are from Abitibi [Que.], Haiti or somewhere else. That isn't what we have now. But what can we do together? At this time, with a multiculturalism that separates us, we are living through every possible aberration," she said.

"There are even values that we would like to adhere to closely, here in Quebec and in the rest of Canada, which are weakened by our separate development and by multiculturalism."

Before delivering these critical remarks about Canadian multiculturalism, Jean, one of the few black journalists working on the French-language Radio-Canada, recalled the degree to which it has always been difficult for a young person from a cultural community to make a career in francophone Canadian public television and in the Quebec media.

"You have before you a person who is perhaps a flesh and blood alibi. You could say, 'Look how good things are in Quebec when it comes to diversity. Michaëlle Jean has been the moderator on the telejournal. She has been on Radio-Canada for 18 years. Now, she is the host of a program that even carries her name, where she interviews personalities, without commercial breaks.'

"People can say, 'Everything is going well in Quebec.' It's true that in France, despite the fact that it is a very cosmopolitan society, I could not have a career in journalism like the one I have here. I still don't see any member of a black race or even anyone of North African origin on national French television… I can tell myself that's fine, Quebec is great."

Jean added, however, that the reality is not so rosy and promising. Young people from cultural communities who want to become journalists have a lot of difficulty in trying to make a place for themselves in francophone Quebec journalistic circles.

"I don't want people to delude themselves. The experience of Michaëlle Jean is still a minority one. In the newsroom of Radio-Canada, where I spend every day of the week, there is a kind of mezzanine from which you can have an overall view. I am sorry to say that you can count on the fingers of one hand the number of people who are different, who ultimately represent modern Quebec, the Quebec of today. Is there really a difference, clear and present on public television? What kind of impact does this have? You will tell me that there has to be a beginning for everything. But, at the same time, Radio-Canada is an institution that continues to feed statistics on its contribution to diversity, to send us papers where one must indicate if one is handicapped, a member of a visible minority, a woman… which I refuse to do because I want to call things by their real name."

This is part of an article that appeared in full in the Montreal edition of Canadian Jewish News Aug. 26. Translation by Carolan Halpern.

ש'שאר ה'נ'נו

הבואות היו שחורות משחור-דובר על הרג יהודים בידי יהודים ומה לא. בשופו של דבר היתה זו אחת משעותיה היפות ביותר של הדמוקרטיה הישראלית. הדרוב המוחלט רצה להתנתק מעזה וידע להשיג את רצונו, לאחר אישור כל המוסדות הדמוקרטיים. שרון שהלך ונעשה ממלכתי יותר ויותר מביט על מרכז הליכוד ואומר לעצמו בוודאי: מה לי ולאנשים האלה.

ומעולם לא ראיתי איפוק כזה, ריסון כזה ורגישות כפי שהפגינו חיילי צה"ל והשוטרים. ממש אות כבוד לדמוקרטיה הישראלית. אבל שישאר בינינו.

אך כל זה לא הפריע ליפי נפש וסתם אוכלי פגרים ללעוג להם, להשמיץ אותם, לדבר בגנותם. "עכשיו הם ידאו את החיים האמיתיים בישראל", "עכשיו הם יראו אבטלה מהי". שכחו לרגע שהם נשלחו לשם כחלוצים על ידי אלון וגלילי, נסיכי ההתישבות של מפלגת העבודה. לא בגין שלח אותם ולא שרון. מפלגת העבודה שלחה אותם!

הצדרה היחידה להפיג את השמחה לאיד ואת שנאת החינם הישראלית היא בהלוויתו של אדם- אז, ורק אז נוכרים כולם איזה נפלא היה האיש. ממש שיא הצביעות. רוצה לומר "תמות לפני שנגיד עליך מילה טובה!"

מאיפה קיבלנו את התכונה המחורבנת הזאת אין לי מושג, אבל אף גוי אנטישמי אינו מביא כל כך הרבה שנאת חינם השמחה לאיד כפי שעושים הישראלים לעצמם. אבל שישאר בינינו.

שנה מאוד מרשימה עברה על אמנית הקרמיקה והפיסול הישראלית אירית לפקין , שמיטב יצירותיה נבחרו לתערוכות חשובות וכללו בספרי אמנות נכבדים.

התערוכה של אירית תתקיים בשבת ראשון, ספטמבר 24-25, ולא כדאי להחמיץ.21 Brockington Cresc, North York

Intel officer takes part in anti-terrorism exercise

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

During his seven-month stint serving with the International Security and Assistance Force (ISAF) in Afghanistan, Capt. M. was shot at, had a gun waved at him in a crowded marketplace and narrowly avoided an ambush by forces loyal to the Taliban.

Thankfully, he'll face no such life-threatening dangers during the Canadian Army's anti-terrorism exercise in Petawawa this week. Operation Stalwart Guardian will bring together about 3,500 army reservists from across Ontario in the year's largest training exercise. "The exercise will realistically simulate a scenario similar to what our troops first faced in Afghanistan, with organized units of the former regime supported by irregular fighters," states a National Defence news release.

The soldiers will take part in attacks, helicopter assaults and raids to simulate the kind of non-conventional warfare expected to predominate in coming years.

Capt. M., an intelligence officer based in Ontario, will participate in "info ops," or information operations, assisting the military commander to complete the mission. That includes communicating with the civilian population.

Military intelligence, both in the field and during exercises like Stalwart Guardian, can include everything ranging from weather reports and information about water and electricity supplies in the affected area to estimates about the enemy's strengths, Capt. M. stated.

The intelligence officer will be among a handful of Jewish soldiers participating in the exercise. Because he serves in a sensitive military capacity, he asked that neither his name nor any identifying information be used. Intelligence units from around the world read publications like The CJN, searching for any information relevant to their cause, he said.

In Afghanistan, German units that did not destroy their mail found that soldiers' families back home received threatening phone calls, he pointed out.

Capt. M. was recruited to intelligence from the artillery. In Afghanistan, his role was to provide intelligence analysis to the ISAF deputy commander, Maj.-Gen. Andrew Leslie, who also headed the 2,000 Canadian soldiers there.

The Canadian contingent made it their goal to treat Afghanis with respect and as a result, good relations were established.

Nevertheless, there were many dangerous moments even in the relative quiet of Kabul. Once while he was on vehicle patrol, someone "opened up" with an AK-47 automatic rifle. The first round sailed over the Canadian vehicle Capt. M. was in and subsequent bullets went even higher and to the left. The gunman, who the intelligence officer described as "too nervous," melted away into a crowd.

On another occasion in a market, he saw someone pull out a gun in a potentially threatening manner. Under Canada's rules of engagement, he was entitled to respond with live fire. However, "I didn't want to turn it into a turkey shoot," with civilians at risk and pandemonium resulting. The gunman in that case blended into the crowd before he could be captured.

Once while on patrol north of Kabul, his unit came upon enemy forces preparing an ambush. It appeared the enemy, likely members of the Taliban, were late in setting up the ambush because they chose instead to rob a passing Afghan truck. Capt. M.'s unit backed off and called in reinforcements, who proceeded to engage the bandits with armoured vehicles. The Taliban, who had several pick-up trucks stocked with heavy machine guns, and anti-tank and other weapons, were destroyed.

As part of the NATO contingent in Afghanistan, Canadian forces co-operated closely with American. forces. That co-operation even extended to friendly encounters. Prior to Yom Kippur, Capt. M. arranged to attend a High Holy Day service organized by U.S. Jewish troops at an old Soviet air force base at Bagram.

The High Holy Day service took place in a tent with about 15 Jewish soldiers participating. A couple were intel officers, several were doctors, there was a female military police officer, some special forces and a few from mechanical trades. An American rabbi led the service and a Torah was flown in from New York.

A soldier during military maneuvers

The rabbi's field kit included camouflage kippot, in green and desert tan, which Capt. M. kept as a souvenir.

Prior to the fast, the soldiers dined on chicken soup and matzah balls, chicken and challah, while they broke the fast the next day with bagels and cream cheese. "The Americans," he said, "do it right."

Testifying to the co-operation between the Canadian and American allies, the U.S. rabbi later checked in on Matthews to see how he was doing, the intelligence officer recounted.

Canadian forces do not have similar ties with the Israel Defence Forces, but IDF tactics are studied. "They're anti-terror experts and experts in urban fighting," he said.

Capt. M. said he once considered enlisting in the IDF. "It would have been the young, romantic thing to do… But ultimately, I'm Canadian. It's the culture I grew up with… I'm about as Canadian as you can get. It's the wellspring from which we flow."

His parents weren't particularly enthusiastic about his career choice. A doctor or lawyer would have been more to their liking. On the other hand, his grandparents "loved it. They thought it was great."

"Since I was a kid, I always liked military things. I read military history and biography. It was a natural fit. It was something I always wanted to do," he said.

Capt. M. acknowledged that few of his contemporaries made the same career choice. Unlike the United States, where the military is an important part of the national culture, "it's not really seen as the Canadian thing to do."

But he said, "If it's where your heart is, you do it."

It's all in the cards.

Israel-bashing by UN should end now: ambassador

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

After the "great sacrifice" his country has made in leaving Gaza, Israel's ambassador to the United Nations says the UN should treat Israel less "abusively."

Dan Gillerman said he expects fewer resolutions denouncing Israel at the upcoming UN General Assembly, as well as the elimination of several "anachronistic" committees promoting Palestinian rights.

At least 20 existing anti-Israel resolutions should "be minimized, if not abolished," he said.

"It can no longer be business as usual after the world watched this painful and dramatic event, one of the boldest, bravest and most dangerous steps any Israeli government has taken…The world was watching Israel's hardest hours and finest hours," Gillerman said at a fundraising event for the Canadian Institute for Jewish Research.

He said not even the United States has been as "open and transparent" in the amount of media coverage it has permitted of the war in Iraq.

However, Gillerman also said that "history will judge in two, three or five years whether this was a prudent move or a venture beyond redemption… I hope somehow we will get through this trauma as a united people."

Gillerman, who has been Israel's ambassador to the UN since January 2003, was named one of 21 vice-presidents of its General Assembly in June, the first Israeli in 53 years to hold the post.

Gillerman said it is up to the Palestinian Authority to make the next move. "They have talked the talk; now it is time to walk the walk. There have been positive statement from [Palestinian Authority President] Mahmoud Abbas, but few positive actions."

He said Israel expects Abbas to act against radicalism by arresting terrorists and confiscating their weapons.

"[Israeli] Prime Minister [Ariel] Sharon will go a long way to reaching a settlement" if this happens. "If not, it will be decades before a chance like this comes again."

Gillerman added that Israel has "no illusions about the Palestinians. We truly feel they are a corrupt society, lacking in transparency and deeply mired in evilness. At the same time, these are the neighbours we were dealt."

He noted the Palestinians are "hated and despised by the Arab world even more than we do."

Gillerman singled out "radical Islam" as the enemy.

"Because of political correctness, no one wants to depict Islam as an evil religion or all Muslims as terrorists. This is true. But it is also true that all terrorists are Muslims."

Gillerman cautioned against the U.S. attempting to democratize the Arab world too quickly. "It's very dangerous. If elections were held tomorrow, it would be another Iran in Egypt, Jordan and even Saudi Arabia. People have to be capable of democracy."

He said moderate Islamic leaders must "examine themselves and finally answer – as historian Bernard Lewis put it – what went wrong?… Why have the mosques become academies of murder?

"Europe is starting to learn the hard way what it means to have a large Muslim population in its midst, what it means to experience terrorism… The world is no longer divided between east and west, or north and south, but between those who are for or against terror… The Palestinians are near the point where they will have to make a decision to stop terror or suffer consequences from Israel and the international community."

As for the UN, Gillerman said it is a "shrine of hypocrisy, duplicity and double standards, but it reflects the world we live in. The UN is only as good as the sum of its members," he said. "Love them or hate them, we have to work with them."

But Gillerman said there have been some positive signs at the UN over the past year, such as the first seminar on anti-Semitism; the special session on the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the Nazi death camps, where Hatikvah was sung, the first time in history that a national anthem was heard in the UN; and the visit by Secretary General Kofi Annan to the new Yad Vashem museum.

Gillerman's election as vice-president, he believes, signals that Israel is being accepted as a more "normal" member of the UN. Israel will submit its first resolution at the General Assembly, one on Holocaust remembrance, in co-operation with the European Union, he said.

"It is up to us to try to make these changes of atmospherics into changes of substance," he said.

As for Canada's record at the UN, Gillerman said he has seen some movement in favour of Israel in its voting, and said Canadian Ambassador Allan Rock is a friend of Israel who has been helpful on a number of occasions.

"I just wish Canada would follow the American line more often than the European line. Canada usually sides with Europe on votes, but the ultimate result is not necessarily anti-Israel."

Gillerman believes Canada's position on Israel is important because it is seen as "the conscience and a compass" by much of the rest of the world, and it may influence regions like Africa and Latin America.

Holocaust symposium geared to 20somethings

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

Worried about who will carry the lessons of the Holocaust into the future, two Toronto women are trying to make sure young adults in the Jewish community have the tools to pass them on.

To that end, Sherri Rotstein and Shawna Spiegelman, the 25-year-old co-chairs of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem's young leadership division, are organizing "Living History: a Holocaust Symposium for the Third Generation," which they hope will give twentysomethings the opportunity to talk about the Holocaust and learn how the Jewish community can apply what it teaches us to today's world.

The Sept. 11 event, to be held at the Lipa Green Building, will give young people the chance to hear from a Holocaust survivor and discuss ways they can keep the memory of the Holocaust alive.

"If we don't focus on youth, who is going to carry on the torch?" asked Spiegelman, a marketing analyst in Toronto.

The women, who both have grandparents who are survivors, say it's easy for people in their 20s and 30s to be forgotten in Holocaust education, because, for the most part, they grew up in prosperity in North America.

And although the event is open to all young people, Spiegelman and Rotstein say they expect many participants to be grandchildren of survivors, who, unlike their parents, know their grandparents and thus have a different and much healthier relationship with their families.

Hank Rosenbaum, chairman of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, which is co-sponsoring the event along with the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, said the symposium is vitally important.

"We have reached a time with anti-Semitism where it is not just a word that was. It is knocking on our door," Rosenbaum said, highlighting a number of events, such as when swastikas were painted on homes in the Toronto area last year. "We are trying to instil [knowledge] in [young people] and show what has happened and how to guard against it."

Rosenbaum added that young people sometimes don't learn about the Holocaust at home.

Rotstein said she is always the youngest person on Holocaust education committees that she sits on, because other young people feel as if they don't belong.

"If we don't start learning now, where is education going to be?" asked Rotstein, the newly appointed co-ordinator of the March of the Living in Toronto.

She said the symposium – which will focus on the themes of anti-Semitism, liberation, memory and denial, and will feature a survivor testimony from Charlene Schiff – will be interactive and not "like a lecture."

Last December, Rotstein and Spiegelman were co-chairs of the "Multi-Generational Dinner of Miracles," in which 60 Holocaust survivors and 200 young adults met over dinner in Toronto at an evening sponsored by the new leadership division of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

Tickets for the Sept. 11 event, are $18. For more information, e-mail: yvnewleadership@hotmail.com or call 416-785-1333.

Time for your close-up, Mr. Abbas

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

"When the withdrawal is complete, Israel will be the darling of the world." That quote from Yoel Marcus opened last week's column, but it still commands reflection. Marcus, one of the top columnists for the Israeli daily Ha'aretz, is a seasoned journalist, not prone to naiveté. He wrote this remark before disengagement, and maybe he was a bit too sanguine. To be sure, Israel, and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon himself, received much international commendation, especially from major elements of the Canadian media, for taking a bold gamble to separate unilaterally from the Palestinians.

Yet reporter Orla Guerin of the BBC probably captured the broader European mood. In a typical editorial comment, for which she has become, she opined from Gaza on Aug. 22: "The world has seen how efficiently the settlers were uprooted from Palestinian soil and won't want Israel to stop at this."

Guerin wasn't referring merely to the disengagement from the northern West Bank. Given her unconcealed sympathies, one suspects she is referring at minimum to the rest of the West Bank and east Jerusalem – the old Green Line.

Like Guerin, other British media believe Israel had no right to be in the "illegally occupied land" of Gaza and the West Bank in the first place (see, for instance, the Guardian editorial "Start of withdrawal," Aug. 15). This is incorrect. Having fought a war of self defence in 1967, it is entirely legitimate for Israel to control whatever territory it obtained pending attainment of full peace and security guarantees through bilateral negotiations.

That is the core of UN Security Council Resolution 242: Israeli withdrawal from captured land (and not necessarily all of it) in exchange for recognition and genuine peace. Journalists who don't understand this or who refuse to accept such basic facts will continue to distort reality and mislead their audiences.

Fortunately, Canadian journalists have a better handle on disengagement. To the mid-point of last week, editorial comment almost uniformly praised Israel's risk-taking and Sharon's gumption, and also placed the onus on the Palestinians to reciprocate.

True, the Ottawa Citizen and the Toronto Star emphasized the need for Israel to help PA president Mahmoud Abbas make Gaza economically viable. They called for Israel to consent to open Gaza's seaport and possibly its airport, and to allow the movement of people and goods in and out of Gaza. Yet, both papers and others were firm that Abbas must now show strength similar to Sharon's and take on the extremists within his population.

The Montreal Gazette editorial (Aug. 19) put this well: "Israelis are rightly adamant: The essential fate of the West Bank and the whole future of Palestinian statehood, depends on Palestinian tactics now." "Now is the time for Abbas… to show courage and hamstring, once and for all, the … terrorism, which has done so much violence to the hopes of Palestinians and Israelis alike."

Shmuel Segev, in the Winnipeg Free Press, (Aug. 16) asked an essential question: How is Israel to strengthen Abbas "when he doesn't appear capable of strengthening himself?"

Ze'ev Schiff, one of Israel's top military and strategic analysts, wrote in Ha'aretz (Aug. 19) that all along, Abbas has based his strategy on his weakness. As Schiff pointed out, Abbas "has not even begun to implement the security reforms he promised."

Schiff is no alarmist, but he warns that if Abbas' attempt to co-opt Hamas backfires and it carries out its plans "to renew its terrorist activity in the West Bank, including firing rockets at Israeli cities," Israel will be forced to respond harshly. In that case "the Palestinians' political aspirations will again be halted and the prospect of another disengagement will vanish."

A dire warning indeed. But the final word goes to Yossi Klein Halevi, whose article "All eyes on the Gaza Strip" (National Post, Aug. 18), included the following: "A wary Israeli public needs to be convinced that the Palestinians want to build their own state more than they want to destroy the Jewish state. Gaza is the test case for that open question."

Prime Minister lauds Gaza pullout

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Paul Martin last week issued a statement welcoming Israel's successful evacuation of settlers from the Gaza Strip and parts of the northern West Bank.

"The government of Canada fully supports the significant decision taken by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and the government of Israel to withdraw from Gaza and parts of the West Bank. We are pleased that the evacuation of settlers was carried out in a relatively peaceful manner," it said.

"Canadians are impressed by the professionalism, discipline and restraint demonstrated by the Israeli Defence Force[s] and police forces involved in the removal of settlers. This is a painful moment for the people of Israel but necessary if the parties are to return to the Quartet's 'road map' [peace] process and resume negotiations for a comprehensive settlement.

"We are pleased that the Israeli government and the Palestinian Authority have co-ordinated certain practical aspects of the withdrawal, proving to the world that they can work together. It is also encouraging that the Israeli government has evacuated the settlers peacefully while the Palestinian Authority has maintained order among the Palestinian population.

"This represents a historic opportunity for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and his people to make progress toward the eventual establishment of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza. We are hopeful that both parties will work toward this goal by respecting their commitments under the 'road map.'"

How to cook like a Jewish grandmother

By NORENE GILLETZ

How to Cook Like a Jewish Grandmother by Marla Brooks (Pelican Books) is all about comfort food and plenty of it. Packed with nostalgia, it contains many old-fashioned family recipes, including those from Slobod's Deli, which was her grandparents' delicatessen in Philadelphia in the 1930s and '40s. There are old family photos and anecdotes sprinkled throughout the book.

The recipes in How to Cook Like a Jewish Grandmother do not include sodium levels, dietary fibre information, carbohydrate counts or any other nutritional guidelines needed to maintain a healthy lifestyle. Taste is all that counts.

There are also recipes from celebrities such as Richard Simmons and Dr. Ruth Westheimer, and crowd-pleasers like brisket, matzah ball soup, chicken wings and much more. Whether you are a novice cook or an experienced gourmand, these recipes are easy to prepare and sure to please. Most of the recipes are suitable for the kosher kitchen.

Marla Brooks

Brooks writes: "Nothing pleasures a Jewish grandmother more than watching her family sit down to a wonderfully prepared meal and eating until they are ready to burst. Grandma's love of food and feeding hungry relatives and friends must've rubbed off on me because from a very early age I'd be in the kitchen helping her out. She taught me to make her delicious chopped liver, cheese blintzes and cold beet borscht early on. I still have her old heavy iron food grinder that attaches to the cutting board, her big wooden bowl and her hand chopper for making chopped herring. Food processors weren't invented yet, but even if they were around, I'm sure she would have considered them nonsense."

The recipes in the book are Brooks' way of handing down family memories to future generations. "There's probably not a person alive who doesn't salivate at the recollection of a favourite childhood meal. Family recipes handed down from generation to generation change very little in the process, because we savour those childhood memories."

These recipes are topped off with a huge dollop of love. Enjoy…

BLUEBERRY BLINTZES

For those who were raised on cheese blintzes, these sweet delights are a nice change of pace. The sweetness of the berries is wonderfully complemented by the tartness of the sour cream garnish.

2 cups blueberries
2 tbsp. sugar
2 tbsp. flour

Mix berries, sugar and flour in a bowl. Toss well and set aside.

Blintzes:
1 cup flour
½ tsp. salt
4 eggs
1 cup water or milk
butter for frying
sour cream for garnish

Sift together flour and salt in a small bowl. In a larger bowl, beat eggs, then add water (or milk) and continue beating. Gradually add sifted flour and salt to egg mixture, stirring constantly until batter is smooth, not lumpy. It should be thin.

Lightly grease a 6-inch skillet or crepe pan with butter. Heat the skillet over a medium-high heat. Pour about ½ cup of batter into the skillet and quickly swirl the batter around to completely cover the bottom of the pan, and pour out any excess batter.

Fry until the blintz begins to blister and the edges curl away from the side of the skillet. Flip out of the pan onto a dishtowel. Use wax paper between layers to keep blintzes from sticking together. Only one side of the blintz should be browned. It's okay if the top of the blintz is slightly moist. Repeat until all batter is used up. Pan should be regreased about every three or four blintzes.

When all blintzes are fried, place 1 tablespoon filling in the centre of each blintz on the browned side. Raise the bottom flap of dough to cover filling. Fold over each side so that they meet in the middle, then roll up like a jelly roll.

Lightly fry blintzes in oil or butter, or place in casserole dish and bake at 425 until lightly browned. Garnish with sour cream. Serves 6.

GRANDMA'S PICKLED CUCUMBERS AND ONIONS

These are so good and incredibly easy to make. They're good for snacking or as a side dish, and terrific on sandwiches.

1 cup water
1 cup vinegar
4 tbsp. sugar
salt to taste
4 large cucumbers
2 large onions

Bring water, vinegar, sugar and salt to a boil in a saucepan. Meanwhile, peel and slice cucumber into about ½-inch slices, then slice the onion into thin rings. Place veggies in a large bowl and cover with hot vinegar mixture from saucepan. Cover and refrigerate for at least 3 hours before serving, mixing once or twice to make sure all vegetables are well marinated. Serves 6.

EASY RICE PUDDING

While Grandma used to slave over a hot stove for most of the dishes she prepared, she'd often make rice pudding the easy way.

1 package (6 oz.) vanilla pudding
1½ cups white cooked rice
½ cup raisins, or to taste
½ tsp. cinnamon

Prepare pudding according to package directions, then add rice, raisins and cinnamon. Refrigerate until thickened. Serves 4.

Healthy cooking for singles

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Studies have shown that single people have the most unhealthy eating patterns of any group. It's just too easy to grab a bowl of cold cereal and milk or to zap a frozen pizza in the microwave. I asked some single friends of mine what they eat, and most often the response was whatever is in the pantry or refrigerator and takes the least amount of time to cook.

After being used to cooking for a family, I live alone now, yet still find it easier to cook for a large crowd than for just one person. Why do so many single people feel this way? For one thing, many people who live alone were used to cooking for a large family and find it difficult to get used to cooking for one. Others have never been on their own before and simply don't know how to cook.

In addition, it seems that most grocery items are packaged in larger quantities. Items that are pre-packaged for one are few and far between and are often ounce-for-ounce much more expensive. But if you buy larger quantities to save money, the food often goes to waste.

One way of solving this problem is to make a large pot of soup, stew or something like a lasagna and freeze it in single portions. Another way is to find recipes for one to four servings.

I like to buy a package of chicken breasts and then individually wrap and freeze them to use as needed. Here are some suggestions that can be done with them. And remember, these recipes are just guidelines. Mix and match and change the ingredients to suit your tastes. You can also sauté the chicken breasts separately and then heat and add the sauce when serving.

MUSHROOM CHICKEN

1-2 tbsp. margarine
½ cup chopped onions
4 boneless chicken breasts
salt and pepper to taste
½ tsp. basil or thyme
½ cup dry white wine

Melt margarine in large skillet over medium heat, add onions and sauté till limp but not brown. Add chicken breasts and remaining ingredients except wine. Sauté 3-4 minutes per side. Add wine and cook another minute or two, until breasts are just firm to the touch and wine is almost evaporated. Remove from skillet and serve. Makes 4 servings.

APRICOT CHICKEN

2 tbsp. oil or margarine
4 boneless chicken breasts
1 small can apricot halves in syrup
2 tbsp. flour

Sauté chicken breasts in oil or margarine in large skillet for 2-3 minutes per side, until golden. Add apricot syrup and apricot halves. Mix flour with 2-3 tbsp. cold water and add to chicken mixture and cook, uncovered until thickened and chicken is just firm to the touch. Makes 4 servings.

CHICKEN À L'ORANGE

2 tbsp. margarine
1 onion, sliced thin
4 boneless chicken breasts
½ cup chicken bouillon
2 oranges, peeled and cut into sections (save juice)
1 tbsp. flour or cornstarch

Heat margarine in large skillet and sauté onion till limp. Add chicken breasts and sauté 2-3 minutes per side, until golden. Add broth and juice from oranges. Mix flour or cornstarch with 2-3 tbsp. cold water or juice and add to chicken mixture. Cook, uncovered, until thickened and chicken is firm to the touch. Garnish with orange sections. Makes 4 servings.

IDF to hand Gaza border over to Egypt

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Following government approval Sunday for an Egyptian takeover control over its border with Gaza, Defense Minister Shaul Mofaz said that the army is expected to complete the hand-over before the end of the year.

According to the agreement approved Sunday by the government, Egyptian border guards will be deployed across from the Philadelphi Route in Rafah, in southern Gaza.

On Wednesday, the agreement was to be brought before the Knesset plenum in a special recess session, as promised by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. Sources in the prime minister's bureau believe the agreement will also win a parliamentary majority.

After it is approved by the Knesset, the agreement will be signed by senior officers in the Israeli and Egyptian armies, to underscore that the deal is one of military security rather than a political one.

Defence sources say the Egyptians are ready for deployment and will enter the designated area within a week or two of the agreement's signing.

Israel views the deployment as a prerequisite for the Israel Defence Forces' withdrawal from the Philadelphi route, which political sources estimate will be completed before Rosh Hashanah in early October.

The head of the political-security branch of the defence ministry, Amos Gilad, and the head of the general staff's operations directorate, Maj.-Gen. Yisrael Ziv, presented the agreement to the cabinet Sunday.

On the day the Knesset votes on the "Philadelphi Agreement," Egypt's intelligence chief, Omar Suleiman, will visit Israel and the Palestinian Authority. Suleiman will meet with Sharon to discuss ramifications of the disengagement and means of preserving the ceasefire.

The agreement stipulates that Egypt will counter terrorism, smuggling and infiltration along the border between Sinai and the Gaza Strip. A contingent of Egyptian border guards will deploy along a 14-kilometre strip, from the shore to the border meeting point near Kibbutz Kerem Shalom, and will be reinforced by four coast-guard boats, as well as air patrols by eight unarmed helicopters.

The Egyptian deployment of 750 soldiers, plus 30 naval soldiers manning the patrol boat marina, will man positions and watchtowers along the border and shore. They will be equipped with side arms, rocket-propelled grenade launchers and light machine guns, and be outfitted with police armoured vehicles, jeeps and quad bikes, as well as land and marine radar systems.

The agreement places stringent restrictions on the contingent, stipulating, for example, where the radar instruments will be placed, and the precise docking location of the coast-guard boats.

The Egyptians are forbidden to install radar systems or equipment for intelligence gathering on the helicopters.

The agreement establishes co-ordination between the IDF and Egyptian army in the operations arena, with a 24-hour "liaison cell," intelligence transfer in real time, communications between the Egyptian helicopters and Israeli air traffic control, and periodic meetings of officers in the sector for assessments. Any unusual occurrence will be probed jointly.

Amendments to the agreement must be agreed upon, with each side having veto power over changes.

A joint committee will convene once every two years, headed by both armies' heads of operations directorates, to review the Egyptians' performance.

The multinational force, which supervises security arrangements in Sinai, will also oversee implementation of the Philadelphi Agreement. The peacekeepers will check weekly to ensure that the Egyptians are adhering to the rules.

At the request of Shinui chair Yosef Lapid, a last-minute codicil was added to the agreement, in which Egypt undertook not to transfer weapons and ammunition to the PA, in keeping with existing agreements prohibiting the Palestinians from receiving equipment without Israeli consent.

The IDF hopes it will be possible to complete the evacuation of the Philadelphi route from Sept. 15 to 20, and to withdraw the army simultaneously from the entire Gaza Strip. The army is awaiting precise instructions on what equipment to dismantle from the line of outposts ahead of the withdrawal.

At Sunday's cabinet meeting, the possibility was raised of transferring the outposts' protective barrier to the Palestinians in its entirety. Palestinian officials, however, have objected to this idea on the grounds that the wall is one of the symbols of the occupation and Israel must dismantle it.

Mofaz said that the West Bank is becoming the primary arena for the war on terror and that he has instructed security officials to focus their efforts on the struggle against terror that is expected to intensify. He added that Israel has made it clear to the Palestinian Authority that it is now up to them to fulfil their commitments and fight against terror.

Summing up the first stage of the disengagement from the Gaza Strip, Mofaz said the complicated part of the pullout was successfully completed, barring two attacks initiated by Jews in Shfaram and Shilo.

The reason for this success, said Mofaz, was the achievement of the goals created by the security establishment: not disengaging under fire, conducting an uninterrupted pullout in a minimal amount of time and treating graves and synagogues with utmost sensitivity.

Palestinian youth, 14, seized carrying 3 bombs

By ILAN OSTFELD
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

A Palestinian boy carrying three pipe bombs was seized Monday at a checkpoint near the West Bank city of Nablus.

Sappers were summoned to the site, the Hawara roadblock, and neutralized the bombs.

The boy was arrested.

Earlier on Monday, an Israel Defence Forces soldier was lightly wounded when Palestinians opened fire on the car in which he was driving in the Gaza Strip.

In a separate incident early Monday, shots were fired at an IDF outpost near the evacuated settlement of Neveh Dekalim, in Gush Katif.

The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine claimed responsibility for the second shooting.

Late Sunday, a mortar shell was fired at central Gush Katif. No injuries were reported in the incidents.

United Nations commends Israel on pullout

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — In a move described by the United Nations as a "rare gesture" to Israel, the UN Security Council issued a special press statement commending Israel on its implementation of the disengagement plan in Gaza and the northern West Bank.

However, the statement also emphasizes the centrality of the "road map" peace plan and the expected pullout from Gaza and the central role of the Quartet, the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia, in the process.

The statement, signed by the president of the Security Council, Kenzo Oshima of Japan, says that "the members of the Security Council welcome the beginning of the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza and parts of the northern West Bank, and they commend the ongoing implementation of this process."

The statement goes on to say that the "members appreciate the co-ordination between the Israeli government and the Palestinian Authority before and during the disengagement."

The statement was issued after a periodic briefing on the situation in the Middle East, presented by Under-Secretary General Ibrahim Gambari of Nigeria. Gambari praised Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and commended his "courage and determination" in implementing the pullout in face of fierce internal opposition. The official also praised the restraint of Israel Defence Forces troops.

However, Israel's ambassador to the UN, Dan Gilerman, expressed displeasure at Gambari's explicit inclusion of negative remarks about Israel at the session. After the briefing, Gilerman told journalists that "at a time when Israel has undertaken a historical move involving many risks, the briefing should have focused on the large picture and not been overly concerned with preserving a balance."

Gilerman said the periodic briefings on the Middle East had become irrelevant and should be discontinued.

Israel asks court to remove ban on razing of Gaza synagogues

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — State prosecutors asked the High Court of Justice Monday to rescind an order forbidding demolition of Gush Katif synagogues in the Gaza Strip.

They also asked the court to reject a motion for an additional hearing on the matter.

On Sunday, the High Court issued a temporary restraining order to prevent the demolition of the synagogues in Gush Katif until further notice.

Justice Ayala Procaccia issued the order in response to a petition for a further hearing submitted by the former rabbi of the Gaza Strip settlement of Elei Sinai, Rabbi Yishai Bar-Chen.

The injunction will remain in force until the High Court decides whether to hold another hearing.

Also on Sunday, the cabinet rejected a demand by chief rabbis Yonah Metzger and Shlomo Amar to refrain from destroying the synagogues.

Instead, the ministers adopted a proposal submitted by Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz under which everything possible will be removed from the 20 synagogues before they are demolished. Two prefabricated buildings that served as synagogues will be moved to Israel inside the pre-1967 armistice line known as the Green Line. Mofaz said he had instructed the Israel Defence Forces to begin dismantling the synagogues immediately.

In the petition to the High Court, haredi spiritual leader Rabbi Yosef Shalom Elyashiv is quoted as calling for an international commitment to preserve the synagogues and leave them standing. "This petition involves the historic fate of the synagogues of Gush Katif in the wider perspective of human rights of individuals and communities, and the violation of the religious sensibilities of Jews throughout the world in the face of the eradication of synagogues," the petition said.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has said that anything that could be dismantled – doors, windows, Stars of David – would be removed and used to commemorate the houses of worship.

Sharon questions Netanyahu's ability to lead country

By MAZAL MUALEM
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Monday issued his harshest criticism yet of Benjamin Netanyahu, one of the people who will seek to unseat him as Likud party chair.

"Benjamin Netanyahu is prone to stress. He panics and loses his cool, and a person like this cannot lead a country," Sharon said on the Channel 10 TV program, London and Kirschenbaum, which aired Monday night.

Sharon said that in Israel, "one needs calm."

He said Netanyahu "had fled from his responsibilities" when he resigned from the government as a result of his opposition to the disengagement from Gaza and part of the West Bank, less than one week before the presentation of the state budget and after having already voted in favour of the pullout.

"Israel is a unique country and one needs good judgment and nerves of steel to lead it. Netanyahu has neither of these two things," Sharon said.

In related events, the Likud tribunal on Monday rejected claims by Sharon's camp that there were forgeries in a list of signatories on a request for a meeting of the Likud central committee.

Sharon and his aides have been making last-minute efforts to delay the meeting, which would discuss bringing forward the party primaries, out of fear that the committee would decide to call for early elections.

Sharon's rivals, Netanyahu and Uzi Landau, had been seeking support for holding the central committee meeting.

Following the tribunal's decision, there is no longer anything to prevent that meeting, and the tribunal will soon determine the date for the meeting.

With Gaza emptied of Israeli settlers – and, within weeks, to be emptied of soldiers as well – Abbas is under heavy international pressure to ensure a quiet transfer of power to the Palestinian Authority.

"Now that Israel has withdrawn, the way forward is clear. The Palestinians must show the world that they will fight terrorism and govern in a peaceful way," U.S. President George W. Bush said in his weekly radio address Saturday.

Abbas used harsh rhetoric to condemn the Be'er Sheva bombing as a terrorist attack, but also suggested that Israel had provoked it with a special forces raid last week that killed five Islamic Jihad gunmen in the West Bank city of Tulkarm.

At the same time, Israel and Egypt reached an agreement on a deal that will result in Israel's relinquishing control of Gaza's border with Egypt.

Instead, 750 Egyptian troops will be posted along the eight-mile frontier to stop arms from being smuggled from Sinai to Palestinian terrorists in Gaza.

The Israeli cabinet approved the arrangement by a vote of 18-2.

Egypt's intelligence chief, Omar Suleiman, is due in Israel next week to seal the deal. But the transfer has its opponents, including the chair of the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee, Yuval Steinitz, who said it would effectively rescind a clause in the 1979 Camp David peace accord requiring that the Sinai Desert remain demilitarized.

Meanwhile, efforts to clear Gaza of the last vestiges of its 9,000 settlers continued. Israeli military rabbis began exhuming 48 bodies buried at the main Gaza settlement bloc of Gush Katif on Sunday, for reinterment inside the Jewish state.

Israel to replant Gaza trees

Israeli environmental specialists began removing hundreds of trees left behind in empty settlements with the goal of eventually returning them to their owners. Orly Doron, a spokesperson for the Jewish National Fund, said the army, which is destroying abandoned homes in the settlements, had asked the agency to replant the trees. Doron said the agency's experts went into Gaza a day after the last settlement was emptied, and identified about 1,000 trees throughout the settlements that could survive transplant. She said the olive, palm and cypress trees would be moved to a field in southern Israel, and eventually returned to former owners once they move into permanent homes.

IDF kills Islamic Jihadis

Israeli special forces killed five Palestinians in the West Bank. The targets of the predawn raids in and around Tulkarm last Thursday were members of Islamic Jihad on Israel's wanted list. Security sources said the fugitives had been involved in recent attacks and were planning to launch a suicide bombing in Israel. The Palestinian Authority accused Israel of threatening a tenuous truce that has been in place for months, and which allowed for a relatively smooth Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. Islamic Jihad and Hamas, vowed revenge.

Rockets fired at Sderot

Palestinians in the Gaza Strip launched two rockets at Israel. One of the rockets struck an open area near the Israeli border town of Sderot, causing no damage. The other fell short, landing inside Gaza. It was the first salvo since Israel evacuated 21 Gaza settlements in the past week. There was no immediate claim of responsibility, but security sources said the launches were believed to be a response to the killing of five Islamic Jihad members in the West Bank by Israeli troops earlier. In a separate incident, a rocket fired from southern Lebanon struck near the northern Israeli town of Margaliot, the first such attack since May.

Kfar Darom detainees freed

Israel freed scores of pro-settlement activists arrested during a violent Gaza Strip confrontation. A Be'er Sheva court released the 175 detainees, almost a quarter of them minors, after they signed agreements not to take part in violent political protests. The decision to free the detainees, who were arrested after holing up on the roof of a synagogue in the Kfar Darom settlement last month as part of protests against the Gaza withdrawal, ran counter to police pledges to see them prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law.

Two stabbed in Jerusalem

Two yeshiva students were stabbed, one fatally last week, in Jerusalem's Old City. The attacker, believed to be a Palestinian, has not been found.

Gaza protester dies

An Israeli woman who set herself on fire to protest the Gaza withdrawal died. The 54-year-old West Bank resident succumbed last Friday to injuries sustained Aug. 7 when she doused herself with kerosene and lit it at a police checkpoint outside Gaza. Police described the incident as a protest suicide. She was to be buried in her home settlement of Kedumim. She was the only Israeli fatality linked to the withdrawal, despite early predictions that the evacuation could spark bloodshed.

Synagogue plan challenged

Israel's chief rabbis came out against a plan to destroy synagogues in former Gaza Strip communities. The Chief Rabbinate issued a statement urging the government to abandon its plan to blow up the synagogues in Gaza settlements evacuated last month, and instead to pressure the Palestinian Authority to agree to safeguard them. The rabbis, who also appealed to the Vatican and other foreign agencies to intervene, argued that destroying the shuls would put Jewish synagogues abroad, which may no longer have congregations, at risk of being razed. The army said that it would likely relocate some of the smaller synagogues, but it was not clear what would happen to the larger ones.

Palestinians focus on the economy

By GIL SEDAN
JTA

Analysis

Contrary to Israeli fears, Palestinian terrorist groups held their fire during the Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. The dire prophecies that the Israeli withdrawal would take place under fire did not come true.

Some see this as proof that the Palestinian election campaign has begun and that Hamas has an interest in projecting the image of a responsible and legitimate political force that can run state affairs as effectively as it can wage war. Hamas leaders, too, read the polls.

One recent poll, conducted by the Palestinian Center for Public Opinion in Ramallah, has shown that the majority of Palestinians believe the Palestinian Authority can't improve their quality of life.

Nabil Kukali, the centre's director, noted that the majority of Palestinians favour an open market and joint ventures between Israelis and Palestinians. The vast majority, around 77 per cent of respondents, worry about their families' subsistence and believe the Palestinian Authority is unable to provide opportunities to labourers who used to work in Israel.

The election campaign may focus more on who can improve the economy than on who can best fight the Israelis.

General elections are set for Jan. 25, 2006. Hamas previously refused to participate in elections, arguing that this meant recognition of the Oslo accords – which led to the creation of the Palestinian Authority – and thus of Israel, which Hamas refuses to accept.

Now Hamas, like Hezbollah in Lebanon before it, is joining the political system. It's too early to tell whether this will replace the group's terrorist activities or exist alongside them.

PA President Mahmoud Abbas opened the election campaign two weeks ago in Gaza, linking the Israeli withdrawal to the "road map" peace plan and demanding a "permanent settlement in which the Gaza Strip and the West Bank will be void of settlements."

But the real challenge lies less in the political statements than in economic developments. Gaza residents will judge the electoral contenders mostly by their ability to use the void left by departing Israelis to improve Palestinian welfare.

"It is time for us to stop building other countries and concentrate on building our homeland," Abbas said at a rally in Gaza two weeks ago. He was referring to the chronic Palestinian need to seek work, whether in Israel or in Arab countries. Some 120,000 Palestinian workers used to work in Israel until the Palestinians launched the intifadah in September 2000, leading Israel to close its border because of security concerns.

"The little jihad is over, and now we have the bigger jihad – the bigger battle is achieving security and economic growth," Abbas said, intentionally using Hamas' vocabulary referring to holy war.

Much could depend on the cash flow from potential donors, though the Palestinians in the past squandered massive infusions of international aid through terrorism and corruption. The G-8 industrialized countries promised $3 billion for Gaza's economic rehabilitation. The bulk of the money will go to projects such as a new seaport, housing construction and infrastructure. The United States already provides the Palestinians with roughly $1 billion a year.

The Palestinians plan to build apartment complexes on top of the demolished settlements. One plan, for example, calls for a 4,000-unit housing project in place of the Morag settlement in the southern Gaza Strip. Israeli contractors hope to take part in the impending building tenders.

"We have officially notified the Palestinians that we are willing to help," Housing Minister Yitzhak Herzog said.

Businessman Shmuel Flatto-Sharon has expressed interest in building a casino in the evacuated settlement of Elei Sinai, on the Gaza-Israel border, a few miles south of Ashkelon.

The Israeli Manufacturers Association is optimistic. Its president, Shraga Brosh, said negotiations are underway to revive the industrial zone near the Erez checkpoint, along with other industrial projects.

Through the mediation of James Wolfensohn, who is co-ordinating economic aid to the Palestinians on behalf of the diplomatic Quartet of the United States, United Nations, European Union and Russia, some 3,500 acres of greenhouses in the Gush Katif settlement bloc have been sold to Palestinians for some $14 million.

Mohammed Dahlan, the PA cabinet minister in charge of co-ordinating the withdrawal with Israel, recently told Forbes magazine that the greenhouses would have created 7,000 jobs in the strip.

But any economic progress depends on a continuation of the ceasefire that largely has held since the winter. Palestinian political analysts say that like Hezbollah, Hamas aims to form a bloc in the next Palestinian Parliament, but at the same time it wants to keep its arms to retain a terrorist option.

Most analysts expect Hamas to maintain a measure of restraint until the elections. The behaviour of other terrorist groups, such as Islamic Jihad or the mainstream Fatah movement's Al-Aksa Brigade, can't be predicted.

Palestinian provocations could trigger sharp Israeli reactions, both military and civilian. When Hezbollah fired Katyusha rockets at Israeli targets in the Galilee following Israel's withdrawal from southern Lebanon in May 2000, Israel threatened to bomb power installations in Beirut – though those threats were largely seen as hollow.

If Palestinians attack Israeli targets, Israel in theory could cut off Gaza's power supply. Gaza is also dependent on Israel for gas and water.

Renewed Palestinian terrorism also may throw into question the revival of the "safe passage" arrangement between the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, an essential element in building a viable Palestinian state.

Even if there is quiet on the Israeli front, a state of anarchy could upset all economic plans for Gaza. In an effort to prevent such a development, Abbas two weeks ago issued a presidential decree temporarily confiscating all land and property left behind by Israel.

Gaza residents, who had expected to reclaim ownership of land they lost to Israeli settlements, now will have to file applications to a PA committee.

Pope's visit to German shul seen as positive

By TOBY AXELROD
JTA

BERLIN — Pope Benedict XVI's visit to a German synagogue last month was replete with symbolism – most notably, the potential for positive relations between the country's Jewish community and a Pope who served in the German army during World War II.

For Germany's Jewish community, which has tripled to more than 100,000 since 1989 with the arrival of former Soviet Jews, the live broadcast of Benedict's visit during World Youth Day in Germany served another purpose.

Millions of Germans tuning in to ARD-TV had a chance to look inside a German synagogue and hear an introduction to Judaism from a Cologne Jewish community board member as they waited for the Pope to arrive.

They learned that Cologne is home to Germany's oldest Jewish community, with documents dating back to the fourth century. They heard the synagogue was rebuilt in 1959 on the site where a synagogue erected in 1899 was destroyed during Kristallnacht on Nov. 9, 1938.

Then they witnessed the rabbi's warm welcome of Benedict, the moment of silence in which they remembered the victims of the Holocaust and the procession to the bimah as a choir sang Heveinu Shalom Aleichem.

For the Catholic Church, the public-relations value against the backdrop of simmering anti-Semitism and Islamophobia in Europe could not be underestimated.

But it could have been much different. While many Germans were proud when their cardinal, Joseph Ratzinger, was elected pope in April – the popular Bild Zeitung tabloid bore the headline, "We Are Pope!" – for many Jews, he embodied a Catholic conservatism that sees other faiths as secondary.

Add to that the Pope's boyhood membership in the Hitler Youth and his recent failure to condemn terror against Israel, and the possibility for tension was there.

For now, however, skepticism seems to have waned, as the Pope's visit marked more evidence of his commitment to interfaith relations.

The event was a historic first. Never before had a pope officially visited a German synagogue. In fact, this was only the second time a pope has formally entered a Jewish house of worship. The late Pope John Paul II visited the Great Synagogue of Rome in April 1986.

Some said the presence of Israeli Ambassador Shimon Stein might bode well for relations between the Vatican and Israel, which were strained over Benedict's recent failure to condemn terrorism against the Jewish state.

Others demanded that the Pope follow words with deeds by opening the doors to the Vatican's World War II-era archive, shedding light on the Church's wartime stance toward the Holocaust.

In his remarks to some 500 people gathered in the Cologne Synagogue, the Pope stressed the future, not the past.

Worried about growing anti-Semitism and xenophobia in Europe, determined to teach tolerance to Catholic youth and noting the negative role played by the Church in the past, Benedict declared his commitment to co-operation with Jews.

He added that interfaith dialogue must be carried out in recognition of "existing differences."

"In those areas in which, due to our profound convictions in faith, we diverge, and indeed precisely in those areas, we need to show respect and love for one another," the Pope said to a standing ovation.

Some said afterward that the Pope should have mentioned Israel, as well as the specific crimes of the Church, such as the massacres carried out during the papally approved Crusades of the 11th-13th centuries and the brutalities of the Spanish Inquisition.

But Cologne Rabbi Natanael Teitelbaum, whose address also drew a standing ovation, told JTA he was "happy with the Pope's remarks. He looked back on Jewish history, and said he is against terrorism and for mutual respect, and those are the most important things."

Paul Spiegel, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, said it didn't matter that the Pope did not directly address the subject of terrorism against Israel.

"That will be between the Vatican and the Israeli government," said Spiegel, who survived the Holocaust in hiding and came back to Germany as a boy with his parents.

Indeed, the dispute between Israel and the Vatican over the Pope's comments appears to have been resolved last week after Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon sent the Pope a letter calling him "a true friend of Israel," Israel's ambassador to the Vatican said last Friday.

Israel's top diplomat at the Vatican, Oded Ben Hur, brought the letter to the Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Angelo Sodano, earlier in the week in what Ben Hur called an "amicable and intimate" meeting that signaled "we definitely see this thing behind us and are looking forward to improving our relationship."

The dispute began in July, when Israel summoned the Vatican envoy to complain the Pope had "deliberately failed" to include a suicide bombing in Netanya when he listed countries recently hit by terror attacks, including Egypt, Britain, Turkey and Iraq.

The two sides publicly traded tit-for-tat pronouncements that culminated with a harshly worded Vatican statement saying the Pope couldn't condemn every Palestinian bombing because Israel would often retaliate with illegal actions that would also have to be condemned.

In his letter, Sharon said Benedict's efforts to promote dialogue with Jews and Israel made him "a true friend of Israel, genuinely committed to advancing tolerance, understanding and reconciliation," Ben Hur said, reading from the letter.

He said Sharon then explained the reasons for Israel's reaction to the omission. "Israel has been devastated and victimized by terrorism and we are very sensitive to any attempt to distinguish between Islamic terrorism which systematically targets innocent Israeli civilians and that which is aimed at citizens of other countries," the ambassador quoted the letter as saying.

Ben Hur said the Vatican said Israel's omission was unintentional and the result of hastily prepared remarks. The Vatican declined comment last week.

Ben Hur confirmed that Israel's two chief rabbis will meet with the Pope Sept. 15, although he said the meeting has been in the works for some time and was due to coincide with the 40th anniversary of the Vatican's Nostra Aetate declaration that revolutionized its relations with Jews.

A time to grow

By SHELLEY MILLMAN HERMAN

Now that we are over the Jewish mourning period that falls during the month of Av, having concluded with a day-long fast on Tisha b'Av (Aug. 14 this year) as the day for mourning the destruction of the first and second temples, we now enter into the month of Elul, which is a time of repentance (tshuvah) for the Jewish people.

It is important for us to understand that each Jewish holiday represents a period that is mirrored by specific actions and sentiments that reflect the historical events that took place at the corresponding period in history.

As we enter the month of Elul, the month before Rosh Hashanah, we focus, through repentance, on erasing our improper actions of the previous year, while creating a plan for personal growth for the upcoming year. In so doing, we build our personal case with God, asking Him to inscribe and seal (on Yom Kippur) our fate for a healthy, successful and positive year to come.

Rosh Hashanah commemorates the time when God created his final and most precious creation – man, Adam. Out of the highest level of love for us, God has given us this special time of year as a generous gift to allow us, his beloved creations, the opportunity to repent and have a positive impact on our fate for the upcoming year – both as individuals and as part of the Jewish nation.

Although Rosh Hashanah is more than a month away, there is no time like the present to begin our process of repentance. Our thoughts should start moving towards how we can grow, where we can find room for improvement and what steps we plan to take to make some lasting changes geared towards achieving our potential.

It is important to begin to reflect upon where we, as individuals, have been this past year, and what changes we would like to make for the upcoming year.

At the same time, we must remember that Rosh Hashanah is the time when we proclaim God as our one and true King. It is when we reaffirm our desire to serve God every moment of our lives – for it is only through this recognition and affirmation that we can truly repent for our past sins.

Through declaring God as our one and only King, we commit ourselves to having to answer to more than just our society, ourselves and our own consciences. As we know, our sense of truth, responsibility and justice will be tainted by our personal whims and the societal trends of our time. We need an Ultimate Source to keep us focused on what is meritorious for all time.

This recognition of God's Kingship may be a challenge for many of us, but it is part and parcel of the whole concept of tshuvah. Therefore, we may want to devote some time to getting to know our Creator. Through reading Torah portions and commentaries and becoming acquainted with some of the many wonderful books and writings available (both online and in Jewish bookstores), and through personal prayer, we can begin to build a relationship with our Almighty God.

After all, we are the chosen people. Our mandate is to be the light unto the nations. In order to live up to this extraordinary task, we must capitalize on our opportunities to improve ourselves. Now begins the specially allotted time to search our soul and begin our journey forward towards atonement, self-renewal and tikkun olam – repairing our world.

Heart and Stroke Foundation walkathon

A big red heart marks Sunday, Sept. 25, on the calendars of thousands of Ontario women, along with those of their families and friends.

That's the day they'll be stepping out in support of the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario's annual Cheerios Heart & Stroke Mother Daughter Walk.

All across the Greater Toronto Area, from Toronto and Unionville to Durham, Etobicoke and Newmarket, participants will join walkers in 77 centres from six provinces, raising funds to support research into the causes of heart disease and stroke among women. This year's goal is to raise $1.63 million in Ontario alone.

According to the Heart and Stroke Foundation, more women than men are now dying from heart disease and stroke and these diseases are the leading cause of death of women in this country. With our aging population, it's critical to understand the underlying causes of these diseases. Raising money through events such as the Cheerios Heart & Stroke Mother Daughter Walk is vital for the research and health-promotion activities of the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario.

This year, the Cheerios Heart&Stroke Mother Daughter Walk takes place in 35 communities across Ontario, including five in the Greater Toronto Area.

Registration for the 2005 Cheerios Heart&Stroke Mother Daughter Walk takes place until the day of the event. Registration is free, and people of all ages can participate. Participants are encouraged to raise a minimum of $20 in pledges.

You can register online, until Sept. 23, at www.heartandstroke.ca/walk or by phone at 1-888-HSF-INFO. You can also register by mail, fax or in person. For more information, call your local Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario office. If you register at www.heartandstroke.ca/walk, you can send e-mails to friends, family and colleagues who would like to sponsor you.

Canadian Idol judge brings Yiddish sensibility

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Canadian Idol judge Zack Werner is an entertainment mover and shaker. In addition to his role assessing young Canadian singing hopefuls on CTV, the former entertainment lawyer owns Venus Management and Records representing recording artists Esthero, Robin Black and Skye Sweetnam, to name a few.

The Winnipeg native, now living in Toronto with his wife and two young children, spoke to The CJN about his Jewishness and how it relates to his work on Idol, which wraps up its third season on Sept. 14.

Zack Werner

CJN: What does Judaism means to you and how does it relate to your work ethic?

Werner: It has always been an important part of my identity. I was definitely raised in a strongly Jewish household. To some extent, it's more significant to me culturally than it is necessarily from a religious perspective and I think that is pretty common of people in my generation. I've always had a strong awareness of my identification with the culture, the people and an understanding of my family's roots, my Zionist feelings and my humanist attitude towards the world. The understanding of how to treat people has been highly informed by my Jewish identity.

CJN: Didn't you miss the live Canadian Idol finale last year because of a Jewish holiday?

Werner: It was the erev Rosh Hashanah. We actually shot the results show earlier than normal, at three o'clock, so we could get finished by sundown. It was moved in order to accommodate me; despite having several months of warning, they were unable to to justify moving the finale, and I was unable in my religious beliefs to justify going to the show.

CJN: In our culture, Jews in show business have changed their names in order to hide their Jewishness. Despite that, you missed last season's finale because it fell on Rosh Hashanah, and you announced it on the air that night in a video clip.

Werner: We all have to make these decisions with regard to our religious beliefs. I had to make a decision as to who I am and how I live my life and what I want my children to think and to stand for in those circumstances.

When you first start doing anything on a public basis, you have to make some decisions as to how much of your private life you want to expose to public view. I'm not walking around wearing a big Magen David, but it's not because I don't want people to know I'm Jewish. I just don't wear jewelry. I've certainly throughout the history of the show used any number of Yiddishisms.

I've never tried to hide my Judaism. In my specific situation, I think the positives that result from somebody standing up and saying "This is who I am, this is how I was raised, this is my belief system, this is my God [outweigh the negatives]." Despite the fact we have a dominant culture here – an Anglo-Christian culture – there comes a time, when people must stand true to who they are. So I was happy to do it, not from an ego perspective, but I thought it was a great honour to be able to say, on behalf of us that are not part of the dominant culture, that we have a right to be respected despite what the cost might be. It was in the great Sandy Koufax tradition.

CJN: How has Canadian Idol evolved over the last three seasons?

Werner: The show changes each year and how you treat it changes. The first year we did it with a wide-eyed, naive attitude. The second year, we thought it was going to be the last year ever. We were very fortunate to have some exceptional contestants that gave us all the freedom to know that the ratings were going to be really strong, so we did the show with a bit of a desperate edge to it that was really fun and a bit dangerous. This year, there is a level of maturity and sophistication to the whole thing, with a higher entertainment value.

I think the cast in particular, really knows how to keep the show exciting and highly entertaining with the basic drama of ourselves, and the kids trying to compete.

CJN: How do you see your role as a judge in the show?

Werner: I'm well aware that it's television and that I'm in character. I think newscasters, journalists and talking heads on television are in character as well. There is the word reality and then there is the concept of reality television, and they are not the same thing.

As the show has developed, my character has gotten more and more freedom to be more multi-dimensional. There's no necessity to wear as much of a mask of role playing. I have more of an ability to free myself and let my character do whatever he wants. He's not as petty as he can come off sometimes during a 15-second sound bite.

CJN: How do you apply your Jewish upbringing to how you treat people on the show?

Werner: It is a pretty talmudic idea – questioning things around you is a strong virtue as a Jew. That was really taught at my house and it gave me the ability to analyze a problem and bring criticism to the fore. Defending your opinion was really advocated at my house, especially when we sat around at big dinners. This Jewish attitude has gone really far in allowing me to be fast as a critic, speak well and stand up for my beliefs.

CJN: On the lighter side, do you feel like you have a Jewish sense of humour?

Werner: I have a great love of the ironies that are happening around us on the show and there is a lot of dark whimsical humour that just slides into these things. It is kind of Woody Allen-esque attitude – you are watching the show and the world is divided into two groups, the pathetic and the desperate. It is a dry, dark sense of humour, which I guess is somewhat Yiddish.

World traveller creates TV series about ethnic women

By SHERI SHEFA
CJN Intern

After having travelled the world for 17 years, from Israel to Russia to England, and being exposed to many different cultures and ethnicities, Susan Poizner was worried that coming back to Canada would be too boring.

When she told a friend that she felt nothing in Canada could compare to the multicultural diversity that England had to offer, he assured her that there are "amazing ethnic groups" all over the country.

Soon after, Poizner, a journalist who loves to write stories that focus on initiatives to create bridges between ethnic communities, decided to turn her passion for different cultures into a project that would expose others to it.

Mother Tongue: A Woman's History of Ethnic Canada, a 13-episode television series, is the product of her passion.

"The two goals [of the series] are to look at women's history and to look at the role women played in Canada and to look at the role ethnic people played in our past as well," Poizner said.

"The original concept was so different from what it is now," said the 39-year-old. She added that, at first, the focus of the show would incorporate women's stories and cooking.

"I felt that maybe cooking and talking about recipes was a way in delving into history. So I was working on the idea of an ethnic cooking series."

In the process of developing her concept, she came in contact with professors of ethnic and women's history in Canada.

"It turns out that there is not enough educational material or audiovisual material that talks about ethnic groups. The idea then slowly developed into this idea of a women's history of ethnic Canada," Poizner said.

"It turns out that women played an incredible role in our past, as did ethnic communities."

Each episode focuses on a woman from a different ethnic group. The cultures featured are Italian, Muslim, Ukrainian, Woodland Cree, Russian Doukhobor, Chinese, Japanese, Finnish, Acadian, Rwandan, Vietnamese, African and Jewish. Poizner documented family history as far back as 1645, and each story is told by a descendant.

While she said it is very difficult to choose a favourite, she did say that the most difficult one to make was the Jewish episode.

"To choose the story was challenging because I know too much about the culture. I grew up in the culture," said Poizner, who attended United Synagogue Day School in Toronto's Forest Hill area as a child.

"I thought I can't do justice to a Holocaust story, so I was avoiding that, but it was really challenging to find the right story because there was an overload of information and not enough objectivity. But in the end we got a lovely story, which was very inspiring."

The Jewish episode tells the story of Sarah Mayoff, a woman who grew up in The Main – essentially, a Jewish ghetto in Montreal.

There was a lot of anti-Semitism in Montreal at this time, Poizner said, but no matter what, Mayoff refused to give up.

"Can you just imagine, she's waking up and going downtown to St. Catherine's Street, where Jews just did not spend time. She got a job in an insurance company there and she built up a really impressive career at a time when Jews were not in the insurance industry, and certainly women did not make it big. She became one of their top sellers," Poizner said.

Mother Tongue, which took three years to complete, began to get funding after "a year and a half of banging on doors and being rejected."

"Interestingly, every time I gave up, I would say, 'God, I worked really hard on this and maybe it's just not meant to be.' I said, 'That's OK, but just show me another door, open another door and I'll go somewhere else.'"

She said that just as she would pull back from the project, she would get a sign to keep going.

Despite the fact that funding was hard to come by, Poizner knew that this was a subject that had never been filmed before and thought she would have to show people what an episode would look like.

She managed to get some funding from tourism boards to document the story of Eliza Ann Parker, "a runaway slave and freedom fighter involved in an armed uprising against slavery in Christiana, Pa., in 1851," but ended up footing much of the cost to produce it herself.

Her break came when Heritage Canada agreed to fund her project. Since she completed the series, Poizner has continued to bang on doors to get broadcasters such as Canadian Learning Television and SCN, a network out of Saskatchewan, to air her series. TVOntario aired her pilot, but declined to pick up the rest of her series.

"I've done all this work and I want people to see it," she said.

Poizner hopes that the series will create a more tolerant society and a better understanding of different cultures.

"Ultimately, our cultures are beautiful and we're all human, we're all different, but we're all the same underneath. I know that even within the Jewish community, there is a fear of outsiders. Some Jewish people are brought up with the idea that you can't trust anybody if they're not Jewish," said Poizner.

"Let's love each other's cultures, appreciate them, disagree where we need to disagree, but not personalize it. I think that is a more peaceful approach to life."

The first episode of the series airs on Canadian Learning Television on Sept. 15. The Jewish episode runs on Nov. 21. For more information, visit www.mothertongue.ca.

L'chaim Retirement Home

Judy Cohen, Founder

Dear Judy:
I want to thank you, Esther, and your outstanding staff for how beautifully you helped my mother make the transition to retirement life. She is so happy with her new friends and the loving attention she gets from the staff. I am so impressed: the staff doesn't just "work" there, they really care about the residents and their families, and treat everyone with such dignity and warmth. L'chaim doesn't feel at all like an institution, it feels like a family. It was an excellent choice!

Octogenarian replicates Chagall windows

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

It is never too late to begin a new hobby.

When Roy Rosenthal was in his mid-50s, he decided that his apartment didn't have enough pictures to fill the walls.

"Rather than buying expensive pictures and frames, I decided to try my hand at producing some art of my own using pieces of vinyl that I had around the house."

Now 84, Rosenthal, who also uses pieces of leather, says, "I picked up scraps from upholsterers and found that the pictures came out fairly well. I framed them and hung them on our walls."

His friends and family wanted some of his leather and vinyl pictures and he soon became busy with his new craft.

"Thus began an unusual hobby, which I developed."

He saw a book with Marc Chagall's 12 stained glass windows at the Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Centre synagogue. When Rosenthal and his wife, Temi, toured Israel, they visited the centre and saw the Chagall windows.

After he retired, Rosenthal decided to try to copy the windows. "It was a very demanding project and it took me more than a year to produce each one, as they are very large."

After he completed four windows and hung them in his apartment, there was very little wall space left for his other works and he distributed most of the smaller pieces to relatives and friends.

He explains that for the Chagall windows, he first creates the leading effect for the windows. The leather and vinyl pieces of different textures are cut, fitted and glued to a wooden board.

Three years ago, the Rosenthals moved into a one-bedroom unit at 2 Neptune Dr. (now the Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community).

"With limited space, there was no way we could hang the four Chagall windows on our walls," he says.

He contacted Vivian Markus, the curator of art at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, and offered to donate the windows to Baycrest.

"She not only found them suitable, but decided to hang them in the main social hall of our building. Since moving into the building, I have completed two additional windows, and the six windows now take up a complete wall in the social hall."

In an interview at their residence, the Rosenthals soon made it clear that Roy and Temi are continuing to lead busy and productive lives.

After graduating from Harbord Collegiate, Roy went to work for his father and two partners at Lion Dress. When the depression hit and the business closed, he went to work at a family friend's printing business.

At 21, he joined the Canadian Air Force and spent four years as a fighter pilot overseas. He has written a 50-page autobiography of his war years titled How I Won the War Single-Handedly and Saved Our Country from the Nazi Hordes. The title reflects his keen sense of humour.

After the war, he and his brother-in-law purchased Wapaska Lodge in Muskoka, a family-operated summer resort, and he continued working in Toronto during the week.

Temi was one of the daughters of Shmuel Meyer Shapiro, the owner/editor of the Hebrew Journal, the forerunner of The Canadian Jewish News. Temi worked at the newspaper and later helped with the work at Wapaska.

She says the experience at the lodge led her to try many different fields over the years – among other endeavours, she operated a cooking school and taught Bible classes at Holy Blossom Temple.

Roy went to work for his father-in-law, typesetting in English and some Yiddish on a linotype machine.

Roy currently prepares the posters and flyers for many of the events at their residence, while Temi is a volunteer at the Wagman Centre and serves as the holiday events chair at the Cipin building.

"I'm happy doing very little these days," Roy says, but the fruits of his labour in the arts and in printing continue to bring joy to those around him.

Online alternative magazine has a pro-Israel slant

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Some aspects of Jewish pop culture have become so intertwined with that of the mainstream that we rarely notice its ever-changing face. But there is a unique subculture beyond bagels, knishes and Seinfeld that also deserves to be represented.

Enter Jewish Mayhem (www.jewishmayhem.com), a racy online magazine that documents the life and times of contemporary urban Jews. The magazine, which was launched in April, features Jewish stories on topics ranging from Israeli rappers to tattoo artists.

Jewish Mayhem was born because there were no other magazines of its kind, says Joshua Andrews, 32, the magazine's founder, editor and publisher.

"There were so many things I wanted to write about and there was nothing out there that talked about the cool and crazy Jews," he says with a laugh. "We want to provide a voice to all facets of Jewish life and document them."

All facets over 18, that is. Jewish Mayhem is for adults only. The magazine has photos of scantily clad women wrapped in Israeli flags and some more than shocking cartoon art. Topics for upcoming issues include Jewish ties to marijuana, the sex trade and tattooing.

Another unique feature of Jewish Mayhem is that it is clearly pro-Israeli, unlike most alternative magazines.

"Most alternative magazines are self-deprecating in a way – we want to counteract that by being as positive as possible. We're for a bigger Israel, not a smaller one. We're for a stronger nation, not a weaker one."

Optimism plays an important role in Jewish Mayhem in other ways. What started as a relatively tiny operation, a hobby even, has grown into a full-fledged magazine that plans to go to print with its next issue.

"My philosophy was, build it and they will come – and that's exactly what happened. If it wasn't for the landslide of e-mails and comments, I probably would have given up."

Andrews prides himself on the fact that the magazine is completely inclusive. "Unlike 99 per cent of the media, we're accessible. We like to give people breaks and play a positive role in their lives," he says.

However, he is equally adamant about keeping the magazine's operation totally within the Jewish community. Andrews says there are already a plethora of forums that nurture other cultures. Jewish Mayhem is meant to be completely grassroots. "We like to pimp out the Jews," he says with a laugh.

Cheeky references aside, keeping the wheels turning is the only way to churn out new talent, and in this respect, Jewish Mayhem is at the top of its game. The magazine is always looking for new content, new advertisers and, of course, new fans – so what better way than to welcome them with open arms?

When asked who would make the best cover for the magazine, Andrews is stumped for the first time in our chat. He mulls over a couple of obscure names and then says, "People who best represent the magazine have yet to come out of the woodwork. I probably haven't even heard of them yet."

Movie trailer king makes a splash at Toronto film festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The snazzy trailer that lights up the screen before each and every movie at the Toronto International Film Festival – which runs this year from Sept. 8 to 17 – is the handiwork of local filmmaker and advertising executive Barry Avrich.

His latest trailer is inspired by the legendary independent auteur John Cassavettes, whom he has long looked up to.

Avrich, who is on the festival's board of directors, has been churning out stylish trailers for the past decade. And as far as he's concerned, the art of making trailers is one of the toughest assignments in the film industry.

"You've got to be visually impactful," said Avrich, the 42-year-old president of Endeavour Marketing, a local ad agency he established this past May after a 20-year career in advertising.

A trailer, he noted in an interview, tests a filmmaker's mettle. It's the festival's corporate and artistic face to the world, and should be smart and snappy, visually and cerebrally appealing, and never less than engaging.

If it is boring or annoying, the trailer has clearly failed, said Avrich, whose mentor, Saul Bass, was one of the finest graphic artists in the United States and the creator of some of Hollywood's most memorable movie titles.

On average, Avrich requires about three weeks to produce a trailer, and invariably, he tinkers with it right up until the last possible moment.

Until 2004, he crafted festival trailers at the Echo advertising agency, where he was a partner, and whose clients ranged from the Stratford Festival to the Alliance Atlantis film and television group.

Though trailers are his forte, Avrich is also known for his documentaries, the newest of which, The Last Mogul: The Life And Times of Lew Wasserman, opened in Los Angeles in June and in Toronto a month later.

Written and directed by Avrich, The Last Mogul is the rags-to-riches story of a Hollywood titan who was chairman and chief executive officer of the Music Corporation of America (MCA) and Universal Studios.

The topic attracted him primarily for two reasons. "I was told it couldn't be done, and I was fascinated by his depth of power. Every mogul deferred to him."

Wasserman, who died in June 2002 after 59 years in the industry, wielded enormous power during his era. Only with the hindsight of his death did Avrich realize how incredibly dominant a figure he had been in Hollywood.

Since The Last Mogul was made without the authorization of Wasserman's family, particularly his widow Edie and his grandson Casey, Avrich found himself embroiled in problems he might otherwise not have encountered.

Rags-to-riches story of a Hollywood titan

Most dauntingly, prospective interviewees did not want to go on the record for an unauthorized documentary, fearing they would offend his still influential family and friends.

"I was told I wouldn't get interviews, financing or a distributor. 'You'll never eat lunch in this town,' they said. My response was, 'I'll eat dinner.'"

Due to what he claims was meddling on the part of the Wassermans, Avrich lost interviews with about 10 individuals who had worked with him – including Steven Spielberg, Barry Diller and a host of talent agents – and the chance to examine Universal's archives.

"We were thrown off Universal's lot," he said ruefully.

In addition, he received an intimidating cellphone message advising him to cancel the project altogether.

"I was a little nervous about that phone call, but I didn't think I was in harm's way."

Strangely enough, however, the current president of Universal Studios, Ron Meyer, took a yen to The Last Mogul after watching it at a special screening.

"He loved it and wanted to be in the movie," Avrich recalled.

Much to Avrich's surprise and delight, Meyer went as far as to invite him for lunch at Universal's commissary and, better still, seated him at Wasserman's old table.

Barry Avrich

Avrich thinks that the family's refusal to co-operate was a reflection of their concern that unsavoury details of Wasserman's life might be exposed.

"Some people, such as Wasserman, are not interested in reliving their past," he said. "Wasserman did not want to rehash the fact that he had been associated with mobsters."

In retrospect, Avrich regrets that he never met Wasserman, whom he greatly admired. As he put it, "He could understand every facet of the business and be great at it."

From a distance, Avrich got a taste of his legendary toughness and acumen when Wasserman tangled with Toronto showman Garth Drabinsky in the late 1980s.

In a textbook example of managerial savvy, Wasserman deftly outmanoeuvred Drabinsky when Drabinsky tried to regain control of the Cineplex movie theatre chain that he and Nat Taylor jointly founded in the 1970s.

Currently, Avrich is finishing a documentary about reclusive Toronto concert promoter Michael Cohl titled Tumbling Dice: The Life And Times of Michael Cohl.

And he has started pre-production work on Heart of a Dragon, a feature about Canadian quadriplegic icon Rick Hansen.

Avrich has also written a screenplay on Nazi-looted Jewish art during the Holocaust. The film is tentatively titled Dirty Hands.

"It's a pet project I keep polishing, a modern day detective story of one of the great international conspiracies of our time. I've lined up some of the financing."

Last year, he wrote and directed A Criminal Mind, a biopic about Toronto criminal lawyer Eddie Greenspan.

Born and raised in the heavily Jewish Montreal suburb of Cote St. Luc, Avrich was drawn to showbiz when he was still a child.

"I was reading Variety when I was eight," he recalled.

After attending United Talmud Torahs and graduating from Herzliah High School, where he picked up a smattering of Hebrew, he simultaneously studied art history at the University of Toronto and film and theatre at Ryerson.

His late father, Irving, was in the clothing business, while his Russian-born grandfather, Louis Garellek, was a kosher butcher. His mother, Faye, was a bookkeeper and rabbi's assistant.

On the advice of an uncle, Avrich chose advertising as a vocation.

"He warned me I'd starve in Canada as a filmmaker," said Avrich, whose wife, Melissa, a movie producer, recently gave birth to a girl.

Avrich heeded his words and opted for advertising, a decision that he has never regretted, and one that has had an impact on Toronto's film festival.

Immigrant writes of hard labour, loneliness of Cuban layover

A Thousand Threads by Tsvi Shapiro, Remembrance Books.

By BILL GLADSTONE

When he turned 18, Tsvi Shapiro decided to leave his home shtetl of Butrimantz rather than be conscripted into the Lithuanian army.

With a half-brother working as a lawyer at the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society in New York, he should have had an excellent chance of being admitted into America and fulfilling his dream of studying philosophy at Columbia University. But a strict new immigration quota system imposed in 1923 effectively closed the drawbridge to Shapiro and countless others.

An immigrant without a destination, he landed in Cuba for what he hoped would be only a temporary stop. Instead, he was stranded for four years of homesickness, worry, hard labour, loneliness and insufferable heat. For the first part of his Havana interlude, he scrubbed floors daily for 12 hours and often studied English in the evenings.

> 'Dramatic story reads like a novel'

"I sometimes take a short break and rest, for otherwise it's impossible because of the terrible heat which prevails even at night," he wrote to his mother and sisters. "One is simply soaked in sweat, and you have to wipe yourself constantly with a towel because otherwise you can't do anything. Naturally such heat saps one of strength."

Many comforting letters reached him from family members and friends in Lithuania. By contrast, missives from his wealthy half-brother in New York were infrequent and terse.

Shapiro ultimately became a successful businessman in the United States and the letters from his Cuban period were relegated to a cardboard box in the attic. His widow discovered them about eight years ago as she was preparing to sell the house.

A niece, Lily Poritz Miller of Toronto, co-ordinated their translation from the original Yiddish and oversaw their publication this year as A Thousand Threads. She and her sister, Olga Zabludoff, co-edited the collection, which they translated with the aid of Torontonian Miriam Beckerman.

If absence made Shapiro's heart grow fonder of Butrimantz, his relatives were quick to remind him of the terrible conditions that prevailed at home, where they were struggling with new tax burdens and other oppressive commercial measures imposed against the Jews.

"It saddened me that you are homesick," his cousin Leah wrote. "I'm very surprised that you are allowing yourself to be so foolish… You have to realize that you cannot always be glued to your mother's apron. This is no ambition, not for a young person. Believe me, dear Hirshela, that you should thank God that you are already out of that small, dirty town of Butrimantz."

His brother Shlomo was even more direct. "In one word, you have nothing to miss," he wrote. "I believe that if you would come to Lita [Lithuania] now, you'd want to run wherever your eyes would take you." And later Shlomo elaborated: "Times are very critical here. There are many bankruptcies in Kovna, and this is spreading to us. They chased out the national council. They are requesting that Jewish signs be removed. We feel like we're being driven out – like we're being exiled."

Meanwhile, poor Shapiro was hearing from his contacts in the United States that life in America was no picnic, either. "The reason I did not write to you for so long is that I don't feel good," wrote an uncle. "My heart is bothering me very much… America is a difficult land for everyone. I developed this condition from working too hard. The strongest person can barely endure it, but the weaker person fades away."

The uncle offered aphorisms to Shapiro to explain his half-brother's aloofness: "You're wondering at Itzhak's coldness towards you. This is America. The rich can help but they don't believe, and the poor believe and cannot help. The Americans have a saying, 'Help yourself.' Put your hope in God, not in people."

Containing many such platitudes and expressions of popular wisdom, the letters illuminate many aspects of the immigrant experience and highlight the "thousand threads" that connect the Jew to his family and friends in the shtetl, no matter where he may be. The affectionate tone and intimate expression of many of the letters highlight their underlying compassion.

But as Poritz Miller observed, the letters also chronicle the worsening conditions for the Jews of Eastern Europe. "I got such a strong sense in the letters of the everyday struggles of the people and of the insidious ways, even in the '20s, of how the Jews were being pushed out," she said.

A published playwright, Poritz Miller is currently writing a film script based on A Thousand Threads. She and Zabludoff previously co-edited The Destruction of the Shtetl Butrimantz, published in 1998.

A former editor at several major New York publishing houses, she worked in Toronto for 18 years as senior editor for McClelland and Stewart. While she judged A Thousand Threads too important a sociological document not to publish, she explained that she chose a small publisher because she knew it would not appeal to a mainstream audience.

Still, the translated collection offers a dramatic story and reads like an epistolary novel. "It's a journal of the immigrant experience and it reflects the changing conditions of the times and the dreams that we had," she said. "I think it will speak to many people."

KIDDISH

Jewish Kids' Fun Page
by Ellene Newman and Hallel Newman

When the world was created, an angel was dispatched to fill it up with people. He carried two sacks on his back, one filled with wise souls and one filled with foolish ones. As he flew over the countryside, he sprinkled them over the terrain, and cities and villages sprang up.

The sacks were almost empty when one of them was torn open by a jutting tree branch. Its contents spilled out onto the ground, and as the angel unsuspectingly returned to heaven, the town of Chelm was born.

Which sack was it? The wise one or the foolish one? Read this story and decide for yourself...

Golden Shoes

a folktale from eastern Europe

The idea originally came up at the weekly meeting of the Chelm sages. "This town is so full of wise people, but nobody knows about it – let us appoint a chief sage!"

The proposal was immediately approved by a unanimous vote. "But who is going to be chief sage?" someone asked.

"Me!" "Me!" everyone answered.

"But that can't be!" demanded Shmerel. "There can only be one chief sage. The rest of us must resign ourselves to being ordinary sages. Which, considering how wise we are, isn't so bad. I recommend that we should choose Chaim as chief sage. After all, it was his idea."

The council reluctantly agreed, and Chaim became chief sage of Chelm.

"But how will everyone know that I am chief sage?" asked Chaim. "I look just like everyone else."

The council deliberated back and forth. Finally, they decided: "We should have a pair of golden shoes made for our chief sage. That way, when he walks through the streets of Chelm, everyone will recognize who he is."

Immediately they commissioned Feivel the goldsmith, and the golden shoes were made.

Bright and early in the morning, Chaim woke up, anxious to walk around in his new shoes. He put them on carefully, but…when he went outside and walked through the muddy streets, the mud quickly covered the shoes! He looked just like everyone else in their muddy shoes!

He ran to the elders and demanded an emergency meeting.

"This is terrible!" muttered the wise men, trying to think of a solution. After a few minutes they decided: "The golden shoes should be cleaned off. Then Mott'l the cobbler should make leather shoes to wear over the golden ones and protect them from the mud."

The plan was quickly put into effect, but… even though the golden shoes stayed clean, nobody could see them! Chaim looked just like everyone else!

He ran back to the elders, and they reconvened. Hours passed before they thought of a solution. "Even though Chaim must still wear the leather shoes over the golden ones to protect them, holes must be cut in the leather shoes so that everyone will be able to see the gold."

Immediately, the holes were cut, but…as Chaim walked through the streets the mud oozed into the holes and completely covered everything!

Again he ran to the council, lamenting his problem. For three whole days they deliberated before deciding, "The Chief Sage's golden shoes must be seen. Therefore we have cut holes in their leather covering, but mud is sinking in and covering the shoes. To keep out the mud, we must fill the holes with straw."

Then and there, they stuffed straw into every single hole, but when Chaim went outside…even though the golden shoes stayed clean, again no one could see them.

In desperation he ran back to the council. Gradually, they realized the impossibility of the situation. For a week, the council secluded themselves, straining their wise minds.

Finally, they hit on the obvious solution. "From now on, the chief sage shall wear ordinary shoes. That way, even if they get muddy, it won't make a difference."

"But how will people know that he is chief sage?"

"Simple! From now on, he shall wear the golden shoes on his hands!"

A cheer rose from the assembled, and they congratulated themselves on their great wisdom. Chaim proudly walked back and forth, his golden shoes glistening at the ends of his arms for all to see.

Israel & the Jewish World

The Epsteins: Russian Jews trying to adapt to Germany

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

HAMBURG — Since the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989 – a historic event that contributed to Germany's reunification in 1990 – tens of thousands of Russian Jews have poured into Germany in a remarkable exodus that has considerably strengthened the Jewish community.

Felix Epstein and his daughter, Ekatarina, are in some ways typical of the Russian newcomers who've dramatically transformed the community's demographic profile.

Felix Epstein

Epstein, 68, a retired shipbuilding engineer from St. Petersburg, immigrated to Germany in 1992, one year after the dissolution of the Soviet Union.

His decision to leave Russia was based on cold calculation. "The political situation was unstable and I was afraid the communists would regain power," he said.

And as a Jew, he felt he had been singled out for discrimination in Russia.

His qualms about Germany's Nazi past notwithstanding, he never seriously considered any other destination but Germany once he decided to emigrate.

When he arrived, he knew not a word of German. A six-month language course helped. But his breakthrough in learning German was the result of a one-month convalescence in a hospital after coming down with an illness.

Since the other patient in his room was a German, Epstein – a friendly fellow who has a knack for putting strangers at ease – spoke only German with him and thus perfected his conversational skills.

Ekatarina (Katya) Epstein

Most Russian immigrants do not mingle with Germans and therefore cannot practise their German often enough, Epstein said.

He and his wife, an engineer who works in a seniors home, reside in a cramped flat in Bramfeld, a working-class neighbourhood in Hamburg that was heavily bombed during World War II.

Like many of his compatriots who came here with high hopes, Epstein experienced difficulty obtaining employment. He landed a job as an engineer six months after his arrival, but it lasted only two years. Altogether, he was employed for seven years prior to his retirement.

Nowadays, he teaches math on the side to supplement a modest pension and runs the local chapter of the Union of Progressive Jews, a Reform group.

Although Epstein is a German passport holder, he does not feel German. Nevertheless, he feels quite happy here, and certainly more fortunate than two families he knows of that returned to Russia in frustration over their inability to learn German and adapt to local conditions.

His son remained behind in St. Petersburg, but his daughter lives in Harburg, a pleasant suburb of Hamburg.

Single at 33, Ekatarina is far more integrated in German society than her parents. A graduate of Hamburg University, she is a Red Cross economist.

In Russia, she was acutely aware of anti-Semitism. "I knew the limits and did not feel completely free," she said.

Known as Katya, Ekatarina preceded her parents to Germany. She originally considered making aliyah, but dropped her plan to settle in Israel due to the 1991 Gulf War.

She was reading the novels of Thomas Mann when the opportunity to settle in Germany arose. Still, her basic knowledge of Germany was minimal. "It was like a black hole."

And she had doubts about Germany. "I wasn't sure whether it was good for a Jew to live here."

Thanks to government-subsidized courses, she picked up the language within a year, though she did not acquire a firm grasp of it for another five years.

Like her father, she feels like a foreigner in Germany. She is content with her life, but in terms of her identity, she feels like a Jew and a European.

"I'm not a German and I don't think I'll ever be a German," she said, adding her Russian friends share her sentiments.

Although she has German friends, she prefers to keep an emotional distance from Germans, if only to protect herself from the possibility of anti-Semitism.

Three years ago, she was shocked to hear a university lecturer utter disparaging comments about Germany's restitution payments to Jewish survivors of the Holocaust. What was all the more disturbing was that his remarks were greeted by complete silence.

Unlike many Russian immigrants, she has a good knowledge of Jewish culture, history and religion. Ekatarina's parents were "conscious Jews" and passed on that legacy to her.

She partakes in the activities of the Union of Progressive Jews. "I can identify with this form of Judaism. It's important that Germans see not only Orthodox Jews, but Jews like us."

Since her resettlement in Germany, she has visited Israel. She revelled in its rich history and loved its landscapes, but felt uncomfortable in the presence of soldiers carrying rifles and guns.

Ekatarina wants to stay in Germany, but only if it remains true to its postwar democratic traditions.

Blind Israeli golfer an ambassador for Beit Halochem

– a low driving bullet that travelled 230 yards right down the middle of the fairway.

His second was aimed straight at the heart of the green. It landed right of the pin, slowed down and then made a left turn, taking the slope and making a bee-line towards the flag. It was, as a Golf Channel commentator might say, as if it had eyes. When the ball disappeared, his playing partners stood in slack-jawed awe. After all, who gets an eagle?

"It's mind blowing," said Alan Baker, president of Maple Downs. "And the guy is just a delight. Everyone involved found it inspiring. He overcame a major handicap."

Sharon's stunning achievement did not come out of the blue. It took years of practice to get to where he is today.

Sharon endured the kind of frustration that can dissuade even sighted golfers, but he refused to give up. He spends as much as 10 hours a day practicing at his home club in Caesarea and another couple of hours working out at a health club run by Beit Halochem, the organization that provides rehabilitation and social services to disabled Israeli army veterans.

Last summer, his Herculean efforts paid off when he entered his first international event, the World Invitational Blind Champion Golfer tournament in Scotland. Wearing a knitted kippah throughout the match, Sharon finished first among blind golfers. At this point, he could legitimately be considered the best blind golfer in the world.

Sharon was in Toronto recently as an ambassador for Beit Halochem Canada (Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel). He played in a Beit Halochem fundraiser at Angus Glen Golf and Country Club as well as social rounds at Maple Downs and Oakdale, two largely Jewish clubs. The tournament netted $70,000 for Beit Halochem's rehabilitation programs for blind veterans. Towards the end of his stay, he won the OVIG (Ontario Visually Impaired Golfers) Provincial Championship Tournament in Cambridge, Ont. with a score of 99.

Sharon, who took up the game about five years ago after a few years away from the sport, has spent the past three winters in Boca Raton, Fla., where he practices his game and receives offers to enter tournaments. An American friend he met in Boca Raton finances his golfing trips. He's played in Palm Springs and San Diego, among other locations, and he sends the funds he raises from his participation to an Israeli school that trains guide dogs.

Sharon acknowledges he could not do what he does without the assistance of Levy, his lifelong friend.

Levy describes the hole, tells him the yardage, and helps him select his club. Once a club is chosen and after Sharon takes a practice swing or two, Levy grounds the club behind the ball aimed in the direction of the shot. Sharon takes his stance from the position of the club and without anything more in the way of a pre-shot routine, makes his swing.

Sharon was first exposed to golf by chance 13 years ago, when his wife's lawyer suggested he try putting some balls on a carpet. He took up the sport thanks to a Beit Halochem program, but he become frustrated with the game and put it aside for several years.

When he took up the sport again, he did so with a vengeance. Today, he feels he's "married to golf." His best round was a 92 at Caesarea, a notoriously difficult course, and an 84 at Kibbutz Ga'ash.

Growing up on Aviel, a co-operative farm, Sharon knew virtually nothing about the sport. The names Arnold Palmer and Jack Nicklaus still mean nothing to him, though he is familiar with today's top golfers, Tiger Woods and Vijay Singh.

A talented athlete in his youth, Sharon was at one time Israel's 1,500-metre champion and a goalie for a second tier professional soccer team.

He served as a sniper in the Israeli Defence Force and later as a sapper. Although he won't describe how he lost his vision, a story last year in Ha'aretz reported he was blinded after a chemical substance sprayed in his face.

These days, Levy is his eyes on the golf course, or as Sharon said, "he's the boss. I just swing the club and he tells me which club to take. He watches the stance, the aim, where the ball is in the stance.

"If I succeed, it's because I'm good. If I don't, it's because he's bad," Sharon said as he breaks into a laugh.

Levy takes the good-natured ribbing with aplomb. "It took him a long time to learn how to hit the ball and learn to play. So every swing is a success for me," he said.

Sharon's feel for the game is now so acute that he knows if he hit the ball well even before Levy tells him. On the par 3, 197-yard second hole, he immediately knew that he had mis-hit his tee shot. The ball landed in a greenside bunker, left of the pin. Sharon promptly hit a lovely "splash" shot that popped the ball out of the sand and onto the green about 15 feet from the hole.

Although Sharon went through a very difficult time following the loss of his vision, he's all smiles on the golf course. It clearly gives him lots of satisfaction and a feeling of accomplishment.

"In golf, what's nice is that you play against yourself. The battle is with yourself. All the time you feel you can do better. Even if the score is 50, you can think to yourself you can get 49."

When he travels and plays golf, he feels he's an ambassador for the Jewish people.

Remarkably, creating artwork and teaching art is another of his passions. He etches the outlines of his subject on wood and then adds colour. It takes him four years to complete one picture, though he works on as many as 10 at a time. A Beit Halochem video that highlights the artwork shows that Sharon's talents are not limited to the golf course.

"I love it very, very much, but it is very, very hard, and you're alone in your room."

One day, when he's older, he'll combine the two loves and draw a picture about golf, he said.

Cohen-Aloro sizzles, Fichman fizzles at Rogers Cup

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

The two Jewish players competing at the recent Rogers Cup Canadian Open women's tennis tournament at York University had different expectations for their debuts in Toronto's major pro tennis tournament.

France's Stephanie Cohen-Aloro, 22, is ranked 87th in the world, and had to qualify to enter the main draw, as she has done in most of the tournaments she has entered in 2005.

Meanwhile, Sharon Fichman of Toronto, Canada's most famous 14-year-old athlete and the first Canadian Jew to compete at the Rogers Cup since Carrie-Lynn Cohen of Toronto in 1989, had high expectations for her debut in her hometown major tournament. Fichman has been featured on national television and in major publications since 2003, when she became the first Canadian to win the Orange Bowl 12s tournament since Canada's best player of all time, Carling Bassett-Seguso, did so in 1979.

Canada is hungry for a tennis champion and Fichman has responded well in junior tournaments. She won the Canadian 18s and under by age 13, was runner-up in the Orange Bowls 14s at 13, and won the Brazilian Banana Bowl in 2005. She is also the youngest ever – at 14 – to play a match for Canada at the Fed Cup, and the youngest – also at 14 – to win a gold medal at the Maccabiah Games (as she did in July).

Yet despite these stellar achievements, Fichman seemed out of place in her first-round qualifying match against Japan's Rika Fujiwara, who is ranked 101 on the WTA Tour. Fujiwara watched Fichman self-destruct with multiple un-forced errors in losing 6-0, 6-1. Fichman's high point came in the fourth game of the second set, breaking Fujiwara at love.

Fichman's reaction wasn't typical for a 14-year-old. She didn't cry, throw tantrums or even scream at herself in the match, and she was buoyed by the hometown crowd chanting "Let's go Sharon, let's go" in every game.

"I had a lot of difficulty stringing some points together, but I knew it would be tough," Fichman said following the match. "She [Fujiwara] had more experience and as I play more events, I am sure that the positive results will come."

"Sharon feels bad now, but she will realize that just being at the tournament making her pro debut will be a memorable achievement. Sharon is without question the best young tennis player in Canada today," said former Canadian pro tennis player Rene Simpson, who is the captain of Canada's Fed Cup team. None of the other seven Canadians competing in the tournament won a match.

Cohen-Aloro had better skill and luck at the tournament than Fichman. She defeated Canadian Heidi El Tabakh of Oakville, Ont., 4-6, 6-4, 6-0 before losing to Sheika Uberoi of India 6-4, 1-6, 6-4 in the second round of qualifying.

Cohen-Aloro benefited from top star Maria Sharapova's withdrawal from the tournament, as Cohen-Aloro advanced to the main draw as a lucky loser. Making the most of the opportunity, Cohen-Aloro defeated her doubles partner, Selina Sfar of Tunisia, 6-2, 7-5 to advance to play fifth seed Serena Williams in the second round.

As the clear underdog, Cohen-Aloro played with heart, inspiration and a solid service return and backhand against Williams. These traits, along with capitalizing on six of 13 break points, won over many of the 11,000 fans watching the match in person and on television.

Despite winning the first set 6-3, Cohen-Aloro couldn't keep up the pace against Williams, who raised the level of her play, despite being hobbled by a knee injury that would later force her to withdraw from the tournament. Williams played with fortitude en route to her 3-6, 6-4, 6-2 victory.

Fichman has joined some outstanding players in pro tennis – among them International Jewish Sports Hall of Famer Julie Heldman, Andrea Leand and Amos Mansdorf – as a Maccabiah gold medal winner. Her predecessors all went on to long careers in tennis.

Fichman's stature is impressive even to the legends of the game.

"I saw Sharon at the ProAm work out. I really think she is the next hope for Canada," said Martina Navratilova, who competed in doubles at the Rogers Cup.

"She gets everything back, she's at the right place at the right time, uses the right shots. It's hard to think she is only 14. If she can be a little bit taller, [Fichman is 5-4], that will help. It's a real disadvantage to be a Justine Henin [who is 5-5] unless you have amazing talent as Justine has. Maybe Sharon has this talent."

Life lessons from a couple of great people

In August, the two most important people in my life – my parents – celebrated their birthdays.

I look at them now and I no longer see a mommy and a daddy. Just as I've grown up in their eyes, my mom and dad have also grown up in mine.

By SANDIE BENITAH

I can't remember what age I was when it hit me that my parents are real people – two adults who once had interests and ambitions outside of their four daughters. But now, I can see them clearly for who they are, and though they are no longer the two perfect superheroes I once thought they were, I can't help but love them even more than before.

The older I get, the more I realize new things about them, and it's as if we are discovering each other for the first time.

Being the youngest child in my family, I was always sheltered from adult conversations. If my parents had something going on in their life, my older sisters were always first in their lineup of people to talk to. Not that I didn't offer a helping hand or open ear, but usually, as with any parent and young child, our conversations mostly consisted of them teaching me life lessons and showing me right from wrong.

They took care of me, and like all attentive parents, they never really let me care for them in return. Now that I think of it, aside from the quirky stories they would tell us about their childhoods, the only thing I ever really knew about them was what they taught me over and over again. My sisters and I defined their existence, and we were always at the centre of their lives.

I don't need to state the obvious – I was a spoiled brat, which is unfortunate, because when my time finally came to pay back their kindness, I fell miserably short.

I remember the countless times my dad would stay up late to not only help me with my homework, but to pretty much finish it for me. One night, he stayed up until four in the morning typing up an essay I had written, just so I could get enough sleep for school the next morning. When I woke up, instead of saying "Thank you," I told him that my teacher would be mad the essay wasn't double-spaced.

Then there was the time I insulted my mother's domestic skills. I was 11 years old and dying to wear my new white pants to school. They were in the laundry, but my mom promised me she would get them clean by the next day. I woke up to find them hanging neatly in my closet, but when I put them on, I noticed a stain that hadn't come out.

"You call this clean??!!!" I yelled at her while she was busy fixing me breakfast. She burst into laughter and told me that I wouldn't have to pay her for her services this week. Normally, I'd be too ashamed to tell this story, but she was so shocked by my behaviour that she has repeated this story to everybody she knows for a good laugh, and so it became a lesson that she has never let me forget.

Today, things are different, and my parents' blossoming into adulthood in my eyes has taught me even more valuable lessons.

I'll never stop thinking that my dad is the smartest, kindest person alive, but now I see another side of a man who's not only a life-saver in the homework department but a person of incredible character who has always stood up for what he believes in, no matter how much trouble it has gotten him into. His character and intelligence have set the standard for what I now look for in a guy.

Then there's my mother, who is, and always will be, my lifeline. Aside from teaching me how to do my own laundry, she has also taught me about the importance of inner strength and perseverance – not by lecturing me but by living her life as the best example for her daughters. No daughter could have had a better woman to emulate.

My parents are far from perfect, but that's the best thing I've learned about them so far. After all, they've loved me through all of my imperfections and now, at last, I've finally learned to say, "Thank you."

About Life

Dear Ella,

My husband and I have been married for 16 years. We are raising a family and are also very involved in our careers. Between home and work responsibilities, sometimes I feel as if we're two ships passing in the night.

My husband Jerry is a lawyer in a very busy law firm. He has an excellent assistant of eight years named Janice. It is not unusual for Jerry and Janice to spend in excess of 70 hours a week together. Jerry often calls Janice to run things by her – things that aren't necessarily work-related. She does the same.

They lean on each other a lot and are very close. I think without even realizing it, Jerry has become involved in an "emotional affair."

I am not usually a jealous person, but I feel a little uncomfortable about their relationship. I don't know if I should bring it up or if I'm being silly.

Is He or Isn't He?

Dear Is He or Isn't He?

In this case, there may be a fine line between a friendship and an emotional affair. Sometimes people who work together spend more time with each other than with their spouses. Sharing feelings with someone can create a very special bond. Janice is there and able to listen to him, and vice versa. My guess is that when you and Jerry spend time together, you discuss matters related to running the family – school, camp, medical appointments, bills etc. There's not much time left for emotional support.

I would not let this situation go any further without a discussion. You have been together for a long time and your lifestyles are making you grow apart. A successful marriage takes effort, even after 16 years. You must spend some quality time together, or this situation has the potential to grow out of control. I don't think you're being silly, especially if Jerry is getting support and caring from Janice instead of you.

You must talk. He may not even realize he is leaning on Janice. You need time alone to rekindle what you had. Invest in a holiday together. It will be an investment in your future and happiness.

Defining the decades

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

At every juncture in life, a certain mindset exists, one that is appropriate for natural growth and distinctive to that time.

Through my interaction with older teens and young adults in their 20s, I have witnessed a refreshing enthusiasm for life with an insatiable thirst to depart their own Ur of Chaldees (the Sumerian city that Abraham left) and uncover and immerse themselves in life's wonders. Similarly, I have also sensed a matching insecurity within them, a fear of this freedom, perhaps stemming from the societal expectations that their future be neatly folded and pressed.

Thirtyish individuals are frequently uncomfortable with being referred to as a "man" or "woman" versus a "guy" or "girl." Yet they walk differently than their twentyish counterparts, with more confidence having survived the early sweat-factory years of their chosen career, or having found a mate and parenthood. Many thirtyish men stare into the mirror with wrinkled brow, gravely cognizant of their receding hairline. Thirtyish women are acutely aware of their biological clocks and therefore display a more ripe demeanour than carefree twentysomethings.

The 40s are different. This decade has been referred to as the age of youth, with a certain richness and humility that influences one's thinking and view of life. Being 45, I can attest to this. I know now that what I know is far less than what I do not know. Yet what I know is dazzling and layered in the complexity of vivid simplicity. I must admit, however, that tellers, cashiers and hotdog vendors regularly call me "sir," a title I once bestowed on rickety old 40-year-olds pretending to be in authority, and that I am generally invisible to women half my age. Oh, the heartache.

Some friends recently turned 50. As 40 is called the age of youth, 50 is considered to be the youth of age. I heard comments from my fiftyish comrades that confirm the truth of this saying, such as "I'm an old guy" or "This committee is for younger people." Maybe fiftyish folks feel old because they remember their childhoods, when people of their generation acted older and indeed their life expectancy was short. It is not surprising that midlife crises afflict those in their 50s. They seem to be bidding adieu to their younger days.

Women in their 60s exude great beauty and insight. Men in their seventh decade are calmer and debonair. The stress of parenting has been replaced with joy and the part-time responsibility of grandparenting, and as retirement arrives so, too does a placid demeanour, which was hidden by years of rigorous monetary bread and buttering and clambering up the ladder of success

The 70s and early 80s are not always the geriatrically impaired years they used to be – in fact, it can be an era of fun. It is a time, to quote a resident at a home for the aged, "when you can tell anyone you want to, to go to hell." Some take a Mediterranean cruise with their spouse. Others, whose partners have departed this earth, are able to grow as individuals, sometimes writing a stately magnum opus or painting canvasses with brushstrokes of ripened wisdom.

Zekainim (elders), in my mind, refers to those who are in their late 80s, 90s and 100-plus. They are unafraid of life and regularly become childlike in nature, free to do and think whatever they choose. Zekainim frequently exude exquisite dignity and, for those who listen to them, they espouse masterful teachings.

So act your age. Or don't. Hop, skip and prance at 90 and disregard society's expectations at 20. After all, what is age? Simply a way of determining who gets to sit by the window.

Canadian tourist escapes New Orleans chaos

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Lou and Honey Elmaleh of Thornhill received a welcome phone call last Wednesday when they learned that their daughter Marni, whom they hadn't heard from since Hurricane Katrina struck two days before, was fine and on her way out of New Orleans, with the help of the National Guard and a local Chabad rabbi.

She arrived home on Thursday night, but as of Friday morning, at least two other Jewish Torontonians were still stranded. A Canadian government representative told The CJN on Thursday that about 50 Canadians in the affected areas had been in touch with the Canadian consulate and were all reported to be safe.

On Monday of last week, Katrina slammed cities and towns along the Gulf Coast, hitting portions of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama and Florida with racing winds and an engulfing downpour. As of the next day, no Canadians had been reported dead or missing, according to a statement released by the Canadian government.

Israel, Pakistan move toward 'engagement'

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Pakistan has decided "to engage Israel" diplomatically in recognition of its withdrawal from the Gaza Strip, Pakistani Foreign Minister Khursheed Kasuri said at a press conference last week, after meeting publicly with his Israeli counterpart for the first time. Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom called the meeting a major breakthrough.

Meanwhile, however, Pakistan President Perves Musharraf stressed that his country will not officially recognize Israel before the establishment of a Palestinian state.

"We will not talk about recognition of Israel until a Palestinian state is established and then we will think about it. We will take people along. This is indirect contact," the president told a meeting of regional leaders in Pakistan's southwestern city of Quetta.

'Major breakthrough'

Kasuri said after the meeting in Istanbul that "Pakistan attaches great importance to Israel's ending its occupation of Gaza. Pakistan has therefore decided to engage Israel."

Shalom said during the press conference that he hoped to open new channels of dialogue with the Muslim world and that the meeting would lead to full diplomatic ties with Pakistan.

"I am sure this meeting will be followed by more meetings in the future," Shalom said. "We hope that finally it will lead to full diplomatic relations with Pakistan as we would like it with all Muslim and Arab countries."

Pakistan's main Islamic opposition party denounced the country's decision to begin diplomatic engagement with Israel, and said it would hang out black flags in a day of protest against the move.

Israel has diplomatic relations with only four Muslim countries –

Relocation fund

TORONTO — UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, in conjunction with its overseas partner, the Jewish Agency for Israel, has established the UJA Relocation Relief Fund to assist the nearly 8,000 Jews who have been removed from the Gaza Strip and four West Bank communities. The fund will provide educational and enrichment scholarships for children, special counselling for children, professional training courses, workshops and seminars for employable adults to discover new professions or open new businesses. For more information, visit www.jewishtoronto.com or call the UJA Federation Hotline at 416- 631-5700.

Exchange program

WINNIPEG — Four students from Tel Aviv University recently concluded an exchange program at the University of Manitoba funded by former Winnipegger Gerry Schwartz. A $500,000 grant to the I.H. Asper School of Business allows students from Tel Aviv University and the University of Manitoba to learn through exchange programs. Four U of M students also visited Israel for the first part of the program, which is to run for 10 years.

Campaign launch

VANCOUVER — Academy Award-winning actress Marlee Matlin will launch the Greater Vancouver Combined Jewish Appeal fundraising campaign later this week. Matlin, who received an Oscar for best actress in Children of a Lesser God, will describe how her Jewish heritage and upbringing helped her overcome her hearing impairment. "The principles of Judaism, of tikkun olam [repairing the world], allowed me to be where I am today," she told the Jewish Independent in Vancouver.

Film fest winner

COPENHAGEN — An Israeli film won the top award at the Copenhagen Film Festival. Live and Become, which tells the story of an Ethiopian who passes as a Jew in order to go to Israel, was named best film at the festival, which ended last week. The film also won an award for best screenplay.

Mayor faces hearing

LONDON — The mayor of London will face a disciplinary hearing for comparing a Jewish journalist to a Nazi concentration camp guard. The Adjudication Panel for England, which will conduct the hearing, could bar Ken Livingstone from office for up to five years. During an exchange earlier this year, the mayor asked Oliver Finegold of the London Evening Standard if he was a German war criminal, since the Daily Mail, the Standard's sister paper, supported the Nazis in the 1930s. When Finegold told Livingstone he was Jewish, Livingstone said, "Well you might be, but actually you are just like a concentration camp guard."

Security assistance

NEW YORK — An evangelical group will fund security measures at the Israeli bus station targeted in a recent terrorist attack. The International Fellowship of Christians and Jews, which is primarily supported by evangelical Christians, authorized $1 million US to help protect the central bus station in the southern city of Be'er Sheva.

Citizenship revoked

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The U.S. District Court in Chicago has revoked the citizenship of Osyp Firishchak for his involvement in Germany's destruction of the Jewish population of Lviv during World War II. U.S. District Judge Samuel Der-Yeghiayan found Firishchak served in the Nazi-created Ukrainian Auxiliary Police from October 1941 to July 1944 and that "he was a participant in an organization that perpetrated some of the most horrific acts against human decency ever known in history."

'Prince of pot' apologizes

OTTAWA — Marc Emery, the "Prince of Pot" and "cannabis activist" from British Columbia, has apologized to Justice Minister Irwin Cotler for referring to him as a "Nazi."

Emery, who faces possible extradition to the United States for selling marijuana seeds to American customers, has compared the suppression of marijuana culture to the Nazi persecution of Jews. Last summer he called Cotler a "Nazi Jew" for permitting the prosecution of marijuana users.

"I thought the term Jewish-Nazi, or Nazi-Jew, was an oxymoron until Cotler became the Injustice Minister," Emery stated on an Internet blog (a Web journal).

When NDP House Leader Libby Davies complained about the characterization, Emery, 47, posted another Web message, this time saying the term "capo" better described Cotler. Capos were concentration camp inmates who co-operated with the Nazis.

Last week, he reversed himself and wrote that employing Nazi descriptions was inappropriate.

York police dismiss complaint about Israel trip

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

York Region's Police Services Board has dismissed a complaint that a trip by the region's police chief to Israel was improper and will hurt policing among minorities.

After hearing 45 minutes of submissions, the civilian board unanimously voted to dismiss the complaint against Police Chief Armand La Barge for participating in the trip last March by a 30-person delegation of Ontario law enforcement officials and politicians. It also dismissed a "policy complaint" lodged against the board for letting La Barge take part.

The complaints were laid in July by Richmond Hill resident Khaled Mouammar, representing the Ontario Committee for Fairness in Policing, and was supported at the hearing by seven area individuals and groups.

Though it moved briskly, last Wednesday's meeting of the board was marked by tension, as Israel came in for a pummeling by area Muslims, Arabs and Palestinians, who described it as an oppressive, racist state from which Canadian police should not draw any lessons.

That, despite repeated warnings from board chair David Barrow that the "only question" at hand was whether the Israel trip complied with the board's policy.

In his remarks to the board, Mouammar lambasted the trip, which was organized by Canadian Jewish Congress and the Ontario Association of Chiefs of Police, as "a worthless learning experience and even a danger to the Canadian public."

Israel, he said, engages in "institutional racial discrimination. [It] has not complied with over 100 United Nations resolutions. If we try to learn from a state, it should not be an outlaw state that does not abide by international law."

By going on the trip, La Barge is "perceived as taking sides. He should be viewed as impartial and neutral. He has alienated over one million Arab and Muslim Canadians" by "unintentionally or unwittingly tolerating racial profiling."

His written submission ran over 45 pages of documents from Amnesty International and the United Nations, citing alleged Israeli violations of international law.

Mouammar called for the recovery of public funds spent on the trip, an apology to York Region and its Palestinian community, "sensitivity training" for the chief and members of the board, and the establishment of criteria for sending police officials abroad, "especially when these trips are funded by a foreign power."

The trip cost taxpayers about $1,500 per traveller; the other half of the bill was paid for by CJC's Ontario region and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Monte Kwinter, minister of community safety and correctional services, was also on the trip, as was then Toronto police chief Julian Fantino and current chief Bill Blair.

In all, law enforcement representatives from 15 Ontario cities, towns and regions, including the Ontario Provincial Police, went on the historic trip to study Israel's anti-terrorism and law-enforcement strategies, and how it handles trauma.

Other speakers sided with Mouammar by slamming Israel as an apartheid state where police target Arabs, Muslims and Christians, as well as practise torture.

Joel Richler, chair of CJC's Ontario region, told the board that the complaint had "no merit." He said it was unfortunate the chief and the board had been drawn into a "political thicket," and called the board's decision to approve La Barge's trip "laudatory."

CJC's chief executive officer, Bernie Farber, called the complaint "frivolous and at the same time dangerous. Most importantly, it seeks to demonize a recognized member of the world community and by extension, a significant component of the Canadian community – the Jewish community.

"This has nothing to do with policy and everything to do with Middle East politics."

In order to believe the allegation that that Muslims won't be treated fairly as a result of La Barge's trip, "you would need to assume that the chief is so easily swayed, that a few days in Israel can turn him into something that he is not. The allegation is essentially one that claims that a trip to Israel can have a corrupting influence on a public official."

Newly appointed board member Daisy Wai called the trip "a way for the chief [to engage] in professional development."

Through a more precise lens

From the editor's desk

During my recent visit to Israel, the entire country, understandably and justifiably, was focused on the acute history unfolding in Gaza.

But even as tens of thousands of soldiers and police were evacuating the communities in Gaza, the daily high-throb pulse of life in the rest of the country continued unabated.

The following are notes from various other scenes from that same week.

On Tisha b'Av I went to see the new museum at Yad Vashem. So too did thousands of others.

The place was overflowing with visitors – Israelis and tourists. There were so many people that at times I had to stop simply to be able to move freely forward without bumping into anyone.

Different languages hummed through the air, a hushed harmony of whispers and sighs. I could easily distinguish the sounds of Hebrew, Yiddish, English, Spanish, French and Russian. But there were more I could not identify. After Hebrew, French was, by far, the language most commonly spoken.

The simplicity of the new museum's design is masterful. It is a long, hollow triangular concrete spike that cuts into and through the mountain like a bookmark demarcating a significant space in a holy text. The spike is not higher than the crest of the hilltop. It does not interrupt the natural vista of this sweeping, fir-lined promontory.

The walk through the museum follows a slalom, zigzag route through a dozen rooms. Each room is a chapter in the story of the Holocaust told chronologically from its beginnings to its end.

One room leads to the next; the necessary prelude to the one that follows. It would be inaccurate to say the rooms are exhibits. They are far more than exhibits. They are a combination of original film footage, mini-documentaries, photographs and original source artifacts.

Part of the pedagogic principle underlying the scheme of the museum, it seems, is to bombard visitors with detail, a super-saturation of images and information, an intense immersion into the atmosphere of the streets of ghettoized Europe. We even see stones from the ghettos and are able to touch them.

The museum's presentation of history is overwhelming. It creates a powerful sense of "being" in the doomed Jewish communities. The reconstruction of the death camps' cramped, wooden barracks, from which we recoil, but to which we are drawn at the same time and the proximity to authentic "artifacts," such as the components of the ovens, the canisters of Zyklon gas, the piles of shoes that people once wore, the broken reading glasses of Janusz Korczak (Henryk Goldschmidt), the burned pieces of the desecrated sifrei Torah, in small part, succeed in reducing the barrier to understanding that time and the unimaginability of the horror erect in the human mind.

As I left the display that leads to the last chamber, the Hall of Names, I saw a heart-rending photo of a sunken-cheeked, emaciated, concentration camp inmate sitting alone on a low fence, crying. He had been "liberated" by the Allies. But liberated to what? To where? To whom?

His anguish moves and condemns us all.

The museum's triangular corridor ends at a glass wall. It is the visitor's catharsis to look out onto the spectacular panorama of the lush Jerusalem hills and onto the communities of Jews who found their way back after the war to the only place on earth they were wanted.

The day that the forced evacuations began, one of the television networks aired a weekly program that takes a nostalgic look back at the main news and entertainment stories of a specific year. Each program focuses on a different year. The show is hosted by the renowned singer Yoram Gaon. He interviews guests who have a connection to the events of the year being showcased. The year highlighted was 1985.

And, of course, one of the key events of that year was the rescue and patriation of the Ethiopian Jews.

We saw film footage of haggard individuals on their long, treacherous and in some cases, deadly trek from Ethiopia to Sudan.

Gaon interviewed an Ethiopian Israeli who had survived that long march as a young child. He also introduced the audience to an older Israeli woman who had been the young Ethiopian child's counsellor, mentor, instructor and first Israeli friend some 20 years earlier.

The reunion of the two was a surprise to the older woman. It was a spontaneous combustion of joy and happiness, hugging, kissing and crying. The image of that reunion from one of the paradigm events that typified the very reason the State of Israel was created served as a bit of an emotional support for the television images that appeared later in the week.

Three weddings took place at the Sheraton Plaza Hotel in Jerusalem where I stayed in the two days after Tisha b'Av. Two of the young couples were from France; the other was from Britain. The canopies were set up outside in the garden near the swimming pool. When the chazzan chanted the seven blessings, his words seemed to penetrate the senses further than usual. We were in the environs of Jerusalem and the sounds of celebration and happiness were so very meaningful to us all. — MBD

Jewish youth: one focus of UJA campaign

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A sellout crowd of 1,200 people were at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel last Thursday night for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's 2006 campaign launch. Some came primarily for the opportunity to hear Israeli guitarist/singer David Broza's 35-minute set, which included a peace song he wrote in 1977 with poet Yonatan Gefen to commemorate then-Egyptian president Anwar Sadat's first visit to Israel.

Joshua Malina of television's The West Wing says there is a shortage of visible Jewish role models in the entertainment industry. [Stephen Epstein/Ponkawonka.com photo]

"I thought I'd get to sing it for a couple of months as the peace process unfolded," he recalled. But, he added, "we haven't and we will not lose hope."

Both Broza and keynote speaker Joshua Malina, who plays White House speechwriter Will Bailey on The West Wing, received standing ovations.

Malina, a Jewish day school alumnus, lauded Toronto's federation for its focus on youth, noting in particular that $12 million is allocated to Jewish education here.

The father of a seven-year-old daughter and three-year-old son who are being raised with Jewish traditions, including a kosher home, a sukkah each year and the singing of Modeh Ani (the prayer to thank God for returning one's soul on awakening) each morning, Malina appears on a recent video aimed at Jewish high school students to help them deal with anti-Israel sentiment on university campuses. The video is being distributed for free in the United States.

"Unfortunately many Jewish college students have to a disturbing degree little or no feeling for their own Judaism," he noted. "We have to give our young people the tools, access and above all the motivation to live substantive Jewish lives."

Malina surmised that part of the reason may be due to a shortage of visible Jewish role models among actors, musicians and comedians "willing to embrace substantive Judaism and Israel publicly."

In Hollywood, he said, "you can't shake a lulav without hitting a famous Jew."

Although he is a strong Israel supporter, Malina said there are things he thinks Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon could have done differently, and there are aspects of Israeli society that "cry out for improvement."

He spoke out strongly against Hamas and Islamic Jihad. "They are not freedom fighters. They're terrorists, and their activities have to be curtailed if there's ever to be any hope for peace in the region."

He said he was very moved on a recent trip to Israel to meet young people who "risked everything" to make aliyah.

Jamie Salter, who co-chaired the launch with Fern Simpson-Reich, said their goal is to raise an additional $10 million over three years. The campaign is focusing on three areas: social justice (assisting the poor and the vulnerable), rebuilding Israeli lives, and connecting Jewish youth to Jewish life through formal and informal education including programs like Birthright Israel.

Campaign 2006 has already raised more than $21 million, said Warren Kimel, who is co-chairing the campaign with Honey Sherman.

Salter also announced the creation of a federation fund to help victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Rabbis accuse Sharon of human rights abuses

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

In a rare display of public dissent, five Toronto-area rabbis have released an open letter to Ariel Sharon in which they accuse Israel's prime minister of widespread human rights abuses against Jews during last month's disengagement from Gaza and the northern West Bank.

Toronto's Jews are "one of Israel's most supportive communities in the Diaspora. Recent events, however, have shaken us to the point that we are forced to protest," wrote the five rabbis, all of them Orthodox.

The religious leaders take Sharon to task for a variety of human rights violations allegedly committed by Israeli troops against the 8,000 Jews evicted from two dozen settlements last month.

The rabbis contend that in February, Sharon declared that anyone who spoke out against the disengagement plan would be guilty of incitement. The Israeli legal aid service, Honenu, "informs us that over a thousand Israeli citizens have been arrested by police or internal security for peaceful demonstration."

The spiritual leaders accuse Israel of abusing human rights in late June, when three girls aged 16, 14 and 13, were arrested for political protest.

The letter slams Israel for its "failure" to adequately compensate the settlers and for ignoring "humane" plans for resettlement.

The government offered to move families "from comfortable, modern homes into trailer caravans, religious families to anti-religious kibbutzim, families with eight children into two-bedroom apartments and to grant hotel accommodations for indefinite periods. Many of the residents are suffering severe distress and some have become suicidal," the letter says.

It adds that on Aug. 15, a team of Israeli mental health professionals was denied access to areas where it was needed to assist in trauma and suicide counselling. "This was unheard of even in the strife of Bosnia, Afghanistan and Sudan."

The rabbis laud the "heroes of [the settlement of] Gush Katif who stood on the front lines protecting our nation, instilling in their children's hearts love and self-sacrifice for the land God gave us. We cannot fathom the pain and anguish they feel at the betrayal of the government as they watch their life work delivered into the hands of their enemies."

The letter's signers claim that both the Israel Defence Forces chief of staff and the head of the Mossad warned that leaving Gaza would endanger Israel, allowing terrorists within close missile range of major population centres and "crippling" the military's ability to prevent attacks.

The rabbis say Sharon fired both experts.

Finally, the open letter calls on Sharon "to respect the rights of each and every citizen of Israel and to uphold the dignity of the nation he has been appointed to lead. We urge the citizens of Israel, as well as all Jews abroad, to join in our protest and do whatever they can that these acts will not continue nor be repeated and to heal our beloved nation."

The signatories are Rabbi Dovid Schochet, president of the Vaad Harabanim of Greater Toronto; Rabbi Moshe Stern, a past president of the Vaad and rabbi of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation; Rabbi Mitch Mandel of Aish HaTorah; Rabbi Yossi Michalowicz of the Westmount Community Shul in Thornhill; and Rabbi Shmuel Spero of Anshei Minsk Synagogue.

Rabbi Schochet told The CJN the reason only five rabbis signed the letter was that many of their colleagues in the city were on vacation and not available. No one refused to sign, though one rabbi said he would write his own letter of protest, Rabbi Schochet said.

Sharon, he said, has "let people down. The country has lost its idealism." He said the open letter "was not a matter of politics but human rights."

Rabbi Stern, who in the past has discouraged airing differences about Israel in public, said he spoke out this time because "a lot of people in the Diaspora didn't have the faintest idea [that] civil rights of Jews were being abused. I was wondering, where were all those liberal-thinking Jews when the rights of their fellow Jews were being violated?"

'Whatever is needed' must be done

It is unbelievable, but nevertheless true, that the word "refugees" is now being used in reference to the most powerful democracy on earth. They are, of course, not political refugees, but rather, refugees from disaster. Tens of thousands of people have lost their homes, their possessions and, in many cases, their livelihoods too in the disastrous aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. And yet, they may have been the lucky ones. For as yet, uncounted thousands may have lost their lives.

As of this writing, more than 80 per cent of New Orleans still lies under water. Communities in Louisiana and Mississippi on the Gulf Coast, an area the size of Great Britain, have been literally washed away.

The damage is beyond our comprehension.

In a real sense, people are now refugees from their homes, as they have no homes to return to. Indeed, three days after Katrina struck, many of these unfortunate souls had neither drunk any water nor eaten any food. Corpses, human waste, industrial waste, dead animals and the foul, stinking detritus of decay and destruction float through the ubiquitous and now deeply polluted water. The threat of disease and further human disaster looms very close by.

But to the natural disaster, alas, human beings are adding more. As the New York Times reported last week, "violent lawlessness" grew extreme in New Orleans. The security situation was described by a local official as "horrific."

"Chaos and gunfire hampered efforts to evacuate the Superdome, [the interim, large-scale shelter in New Orleans]" the Times reported. In addition, "armed thugs" had taken control of the secondary makeshift shelter at the city's convention centre. They repelled police officers sent to secure the place. Police officials reported "rapes and assaults were occurring unimpeded in the neighbouring streets as criminals preyed upon passers-by, including stranded tourists."

Late last week, recriminations and accusations of incompetence were directed at the U.S. administration and various other officials for not responding quickly to the disaster and for failing to have been properly prepared. In due course, these matters will be sorted out. But the urgent priority is to rescue individuals from harm's way, restore their lives and find for them some measure of hope in the despair.

In this, we must lend a hand. Prime Minister Paul Martin spoke for us all when he said "whatever is needed" is what Canada will do to help.

25 years ago in The CJN

- The International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultations blasted a recent statement by the central committee of the World Council of Churches as "political and partisan."
- The World Council of Churches statement called Israel's annexation of East Jerusalem, and declaring the entire city its eternal capital, dangerous and a hindrance to peace.
- The Rosh Hashanah supplement included a lament on the death of Yiddish, and a history of the early farming settlers in Manitoba.

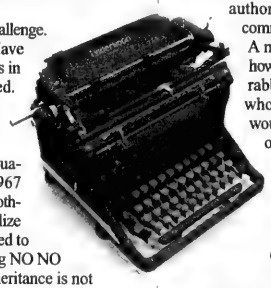
The disengagement

As a former Canadian now living in Israel for the past 23 years, I wanted to share a few thoughts with you and your readers.

I was pleased to see in The CJN such wide coverage of Israel's disengagement from Gaza and part of the West Bank.

Although I live in Israel and your readers live here, we are all equally responsible for the future of Israel. I know there are many who would disagree with me and may consider involvement by Jews who don't live full time in Israel as meddling in internal Israeli policy, but I beg to differ.

The Land of Israel was given as an inheritance to all the Jewish people, and whether Jews come to make their claim in person or not, it does not lessen the joint obligation on the part of every Jew for the safety and security of their brethren who do live there.



I call on your readers to take up this challenge. First, one must stay well informed. Have parlour meetings to discuss current issues in Israel and how you can become involved. Invite guest speakers and community leaders to see what is being done for Israel and what more can be done.

As everyone knows, the Gaza "evacuation" is just the first step back to 1967 borders, and the fact that Sharon may say otherwise is not to be trusted. We must mobilize all our energies to be proactive, as opposed to reactive, in unifying our voices and saying NO NO NO to any concessions to terror. Our inheritance is not negotiable.

These decisions to give in to terror will only pave the way for more terror and more concessions, not only in Israel but throughout the world.

We should reach out to those who are not committed to Israel, because I believe more people would be involved if they really understood the situation better. Each involved person must try to bring one or two more people to meetings or get the information to them.

Together, we will be more successful in working against those who are intent on dismantling our homes and, God forbid, our people.

Lubavitch movement is Zionist

Rabbi Reuben Poupko severely criticized the Lubavitch community for being hypocritical in the article "Montreal Jews demonstrate concerns over Gaza" (CJN, Aug. 25). He said they should not have publicly denounced the government of Israel because they are "anti-Zionist." For the sake of fairness, why didn't Rabbi Poupko also condemn the counter-demonstration of the truly anti-Zionist Neturei Karta and Tash who denounced the State of Israel?

The truth is that the Lubavitch movement is indeed Zionist. Lubavitchers accept the existence of the State of Israel and even serve in the Israel Defence Forces. Of course, Lubavitch, like all of religious Jewry, would prefer that the state act more in accordance with Jewish principles, but that in no way makes them anti-Zionist.

Response to Mirsky

The Torah is a package deal ("Gerber selective on gay marriage," letter, CJN, Aug. 25)? Really? Then I suggest a man kill his son (God forbid!) when his son develops a pattern of behaviour that is profoundly disrespectful and undermines parental authority. See Leviticus 20:9-10. Michael Mirksy's comments are precisely the reason Halachah evolved. A mitzvah is what God wants us to do. Halachah is how the rabbinic authorities want us to do it. No sane rabbinic authority sanctions the killing of a child whose conduct is disrespectful and no sane rabbi would silently acquiesce to a parent suggesting his or her child be put to death! Jean Gerber ("What we should really worry about," CJN, Aug. 11) is not twisting Torah; she is interpreting it.

Geddy Lee and the Holocaust

Just wanted to thank you for publishing "How the Holocaust rocked Rush's Geddy Lee's life," (CJN, Internet edition, Sept. 1).

My initial interest was as a Rush fan. The article provided an insight into Geddy Lee and the subject matter of the band's songs.

But perhaps more importantly, the article provided a personal perspective into the life of Holocaust survivors. In Britain, we continue to have a focus on the atrocities of the war, which I hope keeps the memory of what happened in people's minds. However, we rarely see anything about the aftermath. The Geddy Lee story, which deals with the fact that his mother is a Holocaust survivor, shows the highs and lows of the survivors. Terrible memories and early death, but a new life and success in a new country.

Egypt deal sets stage for Sharon-Netanyahu battle

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

The agreement under which Egyptian forces will guard a perilous corridor along the border with the Gaza Strip could prove key to Ariel Sharon's future.

The success or failure of the agreement with Egypt goes to the heart not only of Sharon's Gaza withdrawal strategy, but also of his political leadership: former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu is highlighting the potential dangers of the agreement in a campaign now moving into high gear to unseat Sharon as Likud party leader and as prime minister.

In a long-anticipated move, Netanyahu announced his candidacy to challenge Sharon just weeks after resigning as finance minister, ostensibly to protest the Gaza withdrawal.

"Ariel Sharon has abandoned the Likud's principles and decided to take another route, the leftist route," Netanyahu told reporters and cheering party rebels who had broken with Sharon over the Gaza move. "He is threatening to destroy with his own hands the house that he helped build."

If the number of incidents in which weapons are smuggled from Egypt across the Gaza border increase – and especially if the Palestinians use smuggled weapons to launch a new wave of terrorism from Gaza – Netanyahu is likely to make major political gains at Sharon's expense.

The Sharon-Netanyahu power struggle could come to a head sooner than expected after a Likud court ruled last Monday, against Sharon's wishes, that the party's central committee would convene in late September to set a date for a leadership primary.

Most political pundits agree that the ruling has set in motion a dynamic that will lead to a split in the Likud, with Sharon leading a moderate wing out of the party rather than losing a leadership race to Netanyahu, who is well ahead in party leadership polls.

Two large questions are at issue between Sharon and Netanyahu over the agreement to allow Egyptian forces to patrol the 8.5-mile stretch of the Gaza-Egypt border known as the Philadelphia route. Will having Egyptians rather than Israelis guard the corridor lead to more terrorism, or less? And will the beefed-up Egyptian presence serve as a bridgehead for more Egyptian forces in the Sinai Desert, forces that might eventually threaten Israel?

Sharon argues that Israel and Egypt have a common interest in preventing Gaza from becoming a terrorist base that could threaten both countries.

The Egyptians, Sharon says, will probably use their influence to prevent Gaza from becoming a jumping-off point for terrorist actions against them. That in turn will mean a weakening of terrorist militias working against Israel, he believes.

Sharon further says that the Philadelphia agreement specifically rules out any further Egyptian deployments in the Sinai. He notes that Israel specifically rejected an Egyptian proposal to deploy thousands more soldiers along the Israeli-Egyptian border south of Gaza down to the Red Sea port of Eilat.

Finally, Sharon argues, what alternatives did Israel have? Leaving a handful of Israeli soldiers exposed on the Philadelphia route would turn them into sitting ducks after the rest of the Israel Defence Forces have left Gaza, and could allow Palestinians and others to argue that Israel has not fully withdrawn from the coastal strip.

Netanyahu argues that by allowing regular Egyptian army forces to patrol the border with Gaza, Israel has created a precedent for a much larger Egyptian deployment in Sinai, no matter what the agreement says. His supporters claim that for the tactical value of preventing smuggling into Gaza, Israel has given up one of the biggest strategic gains of its 1979 peace agreement with Egypt: a fully demilitarized Sinai Peninsula as a buffer between the Israeli and Egyptian armies.

Netanyahu's immediate concern, however, is that Gaza will become a huge base for Palestinian and international terrorism. He maintains that the same logic behind the Gaza withdrawal and the invitation to Egyptian forces to patrol the border will also compel Israel to allow a seaport and airport in Gaza, enabling the Palestinians to bring in heavy weapons and explosives unimpeded.

"Sharon's decision to place Israel's security in the hands of Egypt instead of the IDF is another mistake that gives a tail wind to terror," Netanyahu declared after the cabinet approved the agreement on the Philadelphia route.

The agreement is highly detailed: it allows the Egyptians to deploy 750 border police, 504 machine guns, 94 pistols, 44 Jeeps, 31 armoured personnel carriers, eight helicopters without spy cameras and three radar systems. Egypt will not be allowed to supply weapons to the Palestinians without prior Israeli approval. The multinational force that has been stationed in Sinai since the Israeli-Egyptian peace deal will monitor Egypt's compliance with the restrictions.

The argument over the Philadelphia route hints at the coming bitter struggle between Sharon and Netanyahu. Personal and ideological differences between the two men seem irreconcilable, and a torrent of harsh words make it unlikely that they can remain in the same party.

In announcing his challenge Tuesday, Netanyahu declared that Sharon was not worthy to be prime minister, that he had abandoned Likud ideology and that corruption under his rule was rife.

The night before, in a pre-emptive 45-minute television interview, Sharon characterized Netanyahu as a man who flees from responsibility and doesn't have the nerves to lead a country like Israel.

"In any stressful situation, he immediately panics and loses his cool," Sharon said.

Sharon also dropped several hints that he would not stay around to lose to Netanyahu: he said he will not be Netanyahu's No. 2, the Likud had been infiltrated by far-right elements and is not the same party it was, and he still had work to do as prime minister.

A political analyst for the Ma'ariv newspaper, Nadav Eyal, quotes Sharon aides as saying that the dynamic started by Netanyahu, leading to a central committee move in late September to oust an incumbent prime minister, will be the perfect backdrop for Sharon to establish a new political party. Analysts have spoken of a "big bang" in Israeli politics, under which Sharon would take moderate members of Likud into a new party formed with the secular Shinui party and centrist elements of Labor.

"The Likud central committee, perhaps one of the most hated bodies in Israel, sacking one of the most popular prime ministers because he took Israel out of Gaza, will be a dream start for a new party," Eyal writes, paraphrasing the aides.

Sharon can't afford to run against Netanyahu and lose. It would taint any subsequent decision to leave to start a new party, and would make it far more difficult for Sharon to take other leading Likudniks with him.

Pundits therefore believe he will make his decision soon, probably when he returns from the opening of the United Nations General Assembly in New York in mid-September.

In any event, the Philadelphia route agreement and the Gaza pullout will be high on the agenda of the Sharon-Netanyahu showdown, whether it takes place inside or outside Likud. What happens on the ground in Gaza over the next few months could well decide who Israel's next prime minister will be and what comes next on the Israeli-Palestinian track.

JTA correspondent Dan Baron in Jerusalem contributed to this analysis.

In praise of our teachers

September brings back all the stomach-twisting memories of school anxieties for many of us. I suffered so much from the new school or new grade fixation that I cannot believe I became a teacher. In fact, when my parents and in-laws suggested it, I thought they were mad. Who would want to be a teacher? Embedded in that refrain was not just my student fears, but also my status disdain for the profession of teaching.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Therefore, as appropriate for this season of repentance, I beg forgiveness from all those wonderful and dedicated people we call teacher. First, please forgive me for being afraid of you, for my inability to see you as persons, for my use of cynical humour to cover up my own fear. But mostly forgive me for not seeing the nobility of your chosen career.

Now I admit this change of heart might be due to my own career path. Being a teacher has shown me the error of my thinking. It is the most difficult of jobs and the most awesome. We must remember that simple fact as we send our children to school every morning. We are trusting our most precious possessions to these educators. They will train, form and civilize future generations. They will determine the face of our ever-changing society. It is a great trust, and only the very best should be practising this craft.

Certainly, not every teacher is the best. So our goal should be to ponder ways to perfect the system rather than condemning. I often hear parents complaining about, but seldom praising, the school, administration and teachers. Why is that? Why is it that we do not consider teaching the most prestigious occupation? Why is it that we do not encourage our best and brightest to enter the field?

According to our tradition, a teacher is to be revered, honoured like a parent. The greatest "rebbes" were teachers. Moses was our leader and teacher. Legends tell us that while Moses taught the men, Miriam taught the women; when Abraham taught men, Sarah reached out to women. Judaism pairs teachers with parents to show us the way, to establish our tradition and make sure it is passed on. No society can manage without its educators, and modernity has raised the need for educators to the most intense level.

I have certainly changed my mind, although my stomach still knots up at the start of each year. But I see my colleagues – and especially those who work in early childhood, and especially those who have the stamina for grade school, and especially those who have the commitment to survive high school and can communicate with teenagers. All in all, they are quite amazing and deserving of praise!

Armchair history

"The past is never dead; it isn't even past." William Faulkner, author of this quote, was writing about an American South that never recovered from its past.

But we Jews can't be too smug: our past pops up to haunt us in our prayers, daily as we remember the Exodus from Egypt (c. 1400-1200 BCE), the Exodus plus Creation on Shabbat, and most recently on Tisha b'Av, when catastrophe was piled on catastrophe until we are fasting for catastrophes that include the destruction of the First Temple, the destruction of the Second Temple, the fall of Betar and the expulsion from Spain.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

But Av brings both mourning and joy. Immediately after the ninth of Av, we celebrate marriages galore. So it is with our history: tragedy and hope follow each other.

Prof. Allan Levine makes this point in his recent book, Scattered Among the Peoples: the Jewish Diaspora in Twelve Portraits. By choosing 12 cities at crucial historical periods in Jewish history, he takes us on a journey that includes both despair and hope.

In "Seville, 1492," he uses the towering figure of Don Isaac Abravanel as a fulcrum on which to hang the story of the Jews of Spain and Portugal. Although he rather abbreviates the hundreds of years of prosperity and tolerance that Jews in the Christian and Muslim kingdoms experienced, their expulsion spread the ideas, scholarship and economic acumen of the Sephardim all around the Mediterranean basin, enriching their next haven – the world-dominating Ottoman Empire.

His 12 communities also include Constantinople (1666), Amsterdam (1700), Venice (1516), Vienna (1730), Frankfort (1848), St. Petersburg (1881), Paris (1895), New York (till now), Berlin (1925), Vilna (1944) and Kiev (1967). Each is the site of Jewish settlement and accomplishment; each has its share of persecution and prominence.

In Paris, Capt. Alfred Dreyfus is humiliated and sent to prison. At the same time, the terms under which Jews will continue to live in France are negotiated. Jews continue to live in France and prosper, even after the Holocaust.

So, while many of these communities are no more – in Spain, Germany or Vilna – others have had a rebirth after persecution. In Russia, for example, Levine describes the regeneration of Russian Jewry as it slowly recovers its past and tries to build a future – this even after so many Russian Jews have immigrated to Israel and North America.

So the book does not fall into that category which the great Jewish historian Salo Baron called "the lachrymose theory of Jewish history," that all of Jewish history is just one catastrophe after another, with Jews bending further and further under the weight of suffering and sorrow.

This theory of Jewish history still holds sway in many quarters. Levine, however, believes strongly that, despite the "turmoil of the present day, [Jewish spirit] is testimony to the remarkable resilience that has characterized life in the Diaspora for centuries."

In this, he may run afoul of some Zionist historians, who see all of the past 2,000 years merely as prelude to the rebirth of the Jewish state, a theory that presumes that history travels in a straight line, and the current circumstances – of any people – are deterministic, doomed or blessed from the get-go with the outcomes we have today. At no point could things have turned out differently. This theory gives history a personality and spirit, almost a living persona, which no earthly events could have changed.

No, no. While we can't do history with a series of "what ifs," we can say that history is not a person or a thinking thing, but the outcome of decisions made by human beings, some of which turn out well, some of which go very badly wrong. In the Middle Ages and later, Jews were forced by circumstances to side with elites, and they lost their place when those elites fell. But even being good communists could not save them from Stalin. Bottom line: we do the best we can.

Levine ends his book with the "Good News, Bad News" section. Good news: individual Jews today have more power and security in the Diaspora than ever. Bad news: the tendency is to assimilate completely. Good news: there is a resurgence in Jewish education for children and adults. Bad news: we do not know how many people will take this opportunity.

It may be too late for summer reading, but you can still enjoy this armchair travel around the world before the yamim noraim.

The danger of complacency

It is comforting to know that we live in a peaceful, civil society with laws to protect minorities and a sense that our modern society is accepting and even encouraging of differences – cultural, religious, racial and otherwise. Indeed, in Canada, we have constitutional guarantees of egalitarianism, multiculturalism and religious freedom, Yet, on occasion, we are reminded that there are dangers that seem to lie dormant and then, when we least expect it, suddenly arise.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Recently, we were all taken aback when distinguished aboriginal leader David Ahenakew spouted a vile, anti-Semitic outburst which later led to a conviction under the hate propaganda provisions of the Criminal Code. Ironically, over the years, the organized Jewish community has worked with aboriginal leaders in support of just and fair treatment of Canada's founding people. This support goes back to the 1980s when the national law and social action committee of Canadian Jewish Congress worked closely with the aboriginal community. Indeed, B'nai Brith Canada recently sponsored a trip to Israel for aboriginal leaders and even invited Ahenakew – who refused to go.

The whole Ahenakew matter came as a shock to many. Less of a surprise, however, are the statistics on anti-Semitic incidents in Canada outlined in B'nai Brith's annual hate incident report. In its 2004 Audit of Antisemitic Incidents in Canada, B'nai Brith reported that there were 857 such incidents, a 46.7 per cent increase over the previous year and "the highest number in the 22-year history of the audit." The greatest number of incidents occurred in Toronto and Montreal where most Canadian Jews reside.

This is not really surprising, given similar experiences elsewhere. For example, in July of this year, the New York Times reported that in New York City, 35 per cent of all hate crimes were anti-Semitic in nature. In fact, hate crimes against Jews were the most prevalent (by greater than a two to one margin) of all those reported – with crimes against gays occupying the next most prevalent kind of incident. Hate crimes against gays, however, were significantly more physical in nature than hate crimes against Jews. Both the B'nai Brith audit and the New York City statistics show that where there are large Jewish communities, those communities remain vulnerable to anti-Semitic incidents.

On several occasions, Canadian universities have been the setting for anti-Israel protests. But one would not expect university professors to be the source of anti-Semitic propaganda. Recently, a University of Ottawa professor's website contained writings that claimed, among other things, that the number of persons who died at Auschwitz had been exaggerated. The site admittedly was not hosted by the university but was run by University of Ottawa economist Michael Chossudovsky. The professor, ironically of Jewish descent, claimed he was unaware of the offending content, although it had been posted on his website for months.

As recently as last month, it was reported that vandals broke into the synagogue at the Belz community summer camp in Val Morin, Quebec, and desecrated several sacred books, throwing the texts into toilets and a nearby lake. This action may be related to a municipal dispute in the courts in relation to the chassidic group's operation of a synagogue in a residential area.

Also last month, it was reported that marijuana crusader Marc Emery, in a blog (or Web log), described Canada's minister of justice, Irwin Cotler, as a "Nazi-Jew."

What is most disturbing about the above incidents is that they continue to recur periodically throughout history. Because of this, our various modern societal institutions (our universities, law enforcement and anti-discrimination agencies, the media, etc.) must remain vigilant so that whenever hate rears its head, it can be dealt with in an expeditious manner.

What is the source of hatred, racism and other similar attitudes that plague an otherwise civilized society? Prejudice and intolerance are disseminated through families, peer groups, popular culture, and sometimes political and religious messages. With respect to the latter, this is exacerbated by the speed of modern communications. In order to preserve a society that is respectful of human rights and decency, we are compelled to confront these influences or their increased frequency will be the price of complacency.

The Kirshner File

Sept. 11, 2001 - from the victims' view

Where were you on Sept. 11, 2001, and what were you doing?

You probably know the answer.

This is a day of infamy, like Pearl Harbour and Yitzhak Rabin's assassination, that is burned into our collective souls.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The world has not been quite the same since Arab hijackers deliberately crashed two commercial jetliners into the World Trade Center in Manhattan and caused the north and south towers of that iconic citadel of American capitalism to buckle and collapse in a fiery, dusty heap of rubble.

Thousands of news stories and scholarly articles have been written about this cataclysmic event. But 102 Minutes: The Untold Story of the Fight to Survive Inside the Twin Towers (Henry Holt), by Jim Dwyer and Kevin Flynn, is the first comprehensive account of how 14,000 people in the north tower and south tower dealt with this unprecedented catastrophe.

Their stories are drawn from the testimonies of survivors and witnesses and thousands of pages of transcribed radio transmissions, phone messages, e-mails and oral histories. The authors, both seasoned New York Times reporters, have done a first-rate job of painstakingly reconstructing the disaster from the point of view of its victims. The hijackers themselves, the subjects of numerous analyses, are completely passed over.

The title of their book refers to the horrific sequence of events in Manhattan on Sept. 11. The north tower was hit first, at 8:46 a.m., 16 minutes and 28 seconds before the south tower was struck at 9:02 a.m. The south tower was the first to fall, at 9:58 a.m. Twenty nine minutes and 26 seconds later, at 10:28 a.m., the north tower gave way. During this 102 minute interval, office workers frantically escaped and rescuers tried desperately to save the remainder trapped in the burning buildings. They estimate that at least 1,500 people, and perhaps many more, survived the initial impact, but died because they were unable to make their way to safety.

About 12,000 people, nearly all below the crash zones, got out. But according to New York City's chief medical examiner, 2,749 died. Of these, 147 were passengers or crew members of the two flights – American Airlines Flight 11 and United Airlines Flight 172. Six hundred were caught on the floors where the planes hit and killed immediately. They probably did not even know what had hit them. Four hundred and twelve of the victims were rescuers, firefighters and police officers. The rest, some 1,500 men and women, were hopelessly trapped and did not survive.

Flight 11 slammed into the north tower at 450 miles per hour, its fuselage penetrating the 95th, 96th and 97th floors and the tip of its right wing cutting into the 99th floor. The jet fuel ignited and roared across the sky, and the shock waves from the speeding aircraft shot down in waves, rolling out to the Atlantic Ocean and along the bed of the Hudson River. Flight 175 plunged into the south tower at 545 miles per hour, triggering a swath of destruction across nine floors, from 77 to 85. The building pitched from side to side and drywall collapsed.

Federal investigators concluded that the extreme heat of the fires, not the actual impact or perceived design flaws, caused the buildings to shudder and fall. "Much of the spray-on fireproofing in the impact zone was dislodged, leaving the structural steel exposed and mortally vulnerable to the intense heat," Dwyer and Flynn observe.

In the first 10 minutes after the crash at the north tower, the 911 system logged some 3,000 calls, the majority from people on the upper floors. They reported the explosion and noted that the stairs had been cut off.

It would later come out that while the Twin Towers had only three staircases at its broad base, the Empire State Building – which opened in 1931 – had nine.

Interestingly enough, the World Trade Center's three exit stairways satisfied the requirements of the city's 1968 fire code. But as was apparent after the 1993 attack against the centre, which killed six people, that three stairways were simply insufficient to accommodate a rapid, full-building evacuation of each tower.

This is not to suggest that the authorities had learned nothing from the 1993 attack, which was perpetrated by Islamic radicals as well. Stairways had been painted with photoluminescent paint and fitted with emergency lights with backup batteries. And in the concourse shopping mall beneath the buildings, six stores had been torn out and replaced with corridors to facilitate escapes.

Yet, as Dwyer and Flynn point out, these improvements did not help the people in the highest floors, who had nowhere to go but up. All three staircases in the north tower were wiped out, and in the south tower, only one remained open, but only a handful of people knew about it.

Further, there was no plan for roof rescues by helicopter.

And in the north tower, virtually all of the 99 elevators were out of service, many stuck between floors with people trapped inside. "The lack of working elevators meant the fires high in the tower would have a galloping, destructive head start," they write, adding that the fireball of exploding jet fuel shot down elevator shafts, reaching as far as four levels below the lobby.

In desperation, many people jumped to their deaths, their bodies hitting the ground in thunderous, percussive claps. "Please don't jump," a fire chief spoke into a microphone. "We're coming for you."

The first people were seen falling from the north tower at about 8:48 a.m. Alone or holding hands, they had climbed onto window sills, the only refuge from heat and smoke.

Not everyone jumped voluntarily. Some were nudged by others crowding for a mouthful of air. In the mezzanine of the south tower, one police officer thought he saw 13 people jump in a matter of seconds. One firefighter was killed by a falling body.

Throughout it all, people in the buildings reported their distress.

Dwyer and Flynn reprint this exchange:

"There is a lot of smoke," one man said.

"Are they telling you what to do?" his colleague asked.

"No, it's a mess."

"Are you still in the building."

"You can't move."

In the south tower, the voices on the 105th floor, 20 stories above the impact zone, grew more urgent.

One woman called 911 and said that the floor was collapsing. A moment later, a man on the 106th floor said that a floor below him was giving way.

From the 88th floor, a man told 911 that people were passing out, and that he would break the windows. Calling from the 93rd floor, a man told his father, "The ceiling is caving. The ceiling is caving."

On the 102nd floor, a young man said repeatedly that he had children and did not want to die. "Suddenly, his words were drowned out by crashing noises, a terrible scream, an even worse silence," Dwyer and Flynn write.

Their description of the final few minutes is chilling.

As floors fall, 10 stories in a single second, there is "the screech of failing trusses, the slap of tons of metal columns against other tons of metal, percussive bangs, end sounds."

The terrorists have succeeded. The World Trade Center is gone, 102 minutes having elapsed from the first impact to the final collapse.

Israeli anti-abortion group visits Toronto

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

One step in what organizers hope will become an international effort to fight abortion in Jewish communities is being taken in the Greater Toronto Area this Shabbat.

Over the weekend of Sept 9 to 11, representatives of Efrat, an anti-abortion organization based in Jerusalem, will speak in some of the Orthodox synagogues here.

Dr. Eli Schussheim, chair and director of the organization, will speak at shuls in the south part of the city, while Nir Solomon, director of development and public relations, will be a guest in the shuls farther north.

A major event for women on Sunday will feature a speech and multimedia presentation by Schussheim and Solomon.

Flyers and additional information will be made available at the synagogues throughout the weekend.

Solomon says Toronto was chosen for the pilot weekend because it is known for its sensitivity and is considered an important and influential community in the Jewish Diaspora.

The Va'ad Harabonim, the central organization of all the Orthodox rabbis in Toronto, chose to help advance the cause of Efrat, Solomon said, in part as a result of the support of Rabbi Shlomo Miller, the rosh kollel of Toronto Kollel Avreichim.

"It is our hope that this model of a Shabbat dedicated to Efrat… will lead to more communities around the world following," he said.

Schussheim immigrated to Israel from Argentina in 1964 and was the principal surgeon at Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek hospital during the Six Day War.

In 1977, a young woman came to his office with a child who needed some stitches. During the course of her visit, the woman startled the doctor by saying that he had saved her child.

When it became apparent that the woman was not talking about the stitches, she explained that when she was pregnant, several doctors had told her to abort the baby because she had had too many X-rays and the baby would be deformed.

When she went to Schussheim for another opinion, he said he did not believe the X-rays would cause deformity in the baby. That baby was the same child he was stitching up.

It was then that Schussheim began to devote his life to saving babies from abortion.

Since the establishment of Efrat in the late 1970s, Schussheim has worked through the organization to prevent more than 16,000 Jewish babies in Israel from being aborted.

City considered influential in Jewish Diaspora

It was reported in the newspaper Jewish Press in December 2004 that an average of four Israelis per week were killed in terror attacks and close to nine Israelis a week lose their lives in car accidents. "However, nearly 900 Jewish lives each and every week are literally being tossed in the garbage as a result of the growing number of abortions in Israel."

Although many of those who work for Efrat are Orthodox, Efrat is not a religious organization, and Solomon said 95 per cent of the women they counsel are not religious at all.

Efrat acknowledges that every woman has the right to choose whether or not to have her baby, but stresses that it should be an educated decision.

"They need to know the medical dangers in having an abortion as well as the fact that they are putting an end to the lives of their children," Solomon said.

According to Solomon, 75 per cent of the women Efrat helps are married women who are choosing abortion because of funds.

With its army of 3,000 volunteers (many of whom were helped by Efrat), Efrat has helped many women to choose the life of their babies over abortion.

Once a pregnant woman has been convinced to carry through to term, Efrat continues to help her in any way it can.

She receives free medical advice for the duration of her pregnancy and then the organization provides her with everything she needs for herself and her newborn, including crib, carriage, clothing, baby food and diapers, plus a six-month food stipend at her local supermarket.

They do not provide cash, but ask the mother to write out a list of her monthly food and other needs, and Efrat makes out a cheque to her local supermarket.

The entire package costs no more than $1,000 according to Solomon.

Efrat does not receive government funding but raises its capital through CRIB – Committee for the Rescue of Israel's Babies – its fundraising arm.

"The more money we have, the more women we can help," Solomon said.

The aim of the organization is to try to make sure that no life should ever be taken for lack of money.

"This cause being the greatest life-saver in Israel today needs to be supported now more than ever," Solomon said. "In a time when terror strikes so close to home, we must realize the value of life and help those women who so desperately stand at the verge of terminating their pregnancies for financial reasons when we could solve this problem. No one can deny the importance of saving a life."

Elite Academy caters to bright, mature students

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

At 17 years old, Amira Israelov can see into her future.

A student since last October in the Elite Academy, the international high school of Israel, Israelov plans to complete her courses in biology and math, and eventually to study in the faculty of medicine at Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Her ultimate goal, she says, is to practise psychiatry in Israel.

Born in the former Soviet Union, Israelov is the eldest of four siblings. Her family moved to Canada via Israel when she was four years old.

It was a nine-month stay in Israel when she was 13, however, that changed her life. "I missed Toronto when I was there, but when we returned, I knew I had to live in Israel. I had a longing feeling that never left me," says Israelov, here for the summer to visit her family.

Eventually, she heard about the Elite Academy, a three-year scholarship program co-funded by the State of Israel and the Jewish Agency for Israel.

The program, available in secular and religious schools, has run for a number of years with students from South America, South Africa and eastern and western Europe, and recently expanded to include youth from North America, the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand.

It is intended for bright, well adjusted, mature students in grades 9 or 10, who want to study in Israel.

In order to be accepted, Israelov was required to attend an interview here with a shaliach who recommended her to the academy, travel to New York to take tests, and along with her parents, attend an interview with a psychologist.

Amira Israelov

Dina Gidron, regional director of the Israel Aliyah Centre, says the screening process is necessary because it is important to establish why students want to study at the academy. "It's not for those who want a year off or who just want to get away from home; it's for students for want to work hard at their studies, and experience Israel."

Students receive airfare to Israel, room and board, pocket money and telephone expenses. They take part in field trips, extracurricular activities and seminars, and have Israeli host families available – Israelov's grandparents live in Israel and she sees them every two weeks – for those who want a "home away from home" during school holidays.

Every student is fully insured, including for medical and dental treatment, for the duration of the program.

It is a "whole program" says Gidron. "It [addresses] students personally, academically and socially."

Israelov, who attended Northview Heights Secondary School while living here, says she attends classes with students from Russia, Germany, France, South America and Hungary.

Their first year, students study in their own language, and then move into Israeli classes. "We have a year to get accustomed to learning in Hebrew. We spend a lot of time studying, but it is all worth it."

She says without hesitation that she will remain in Israel. "Life is different there. Here, everything is work, work, work. In Israel, they know when to work and when to have family time."

She is not nervous about living in Israel, she says, "and as far as I know, most students feel the same way. People are more nervous here about what goes on in Israel. We don't pay that much attention.

"As far as I'm concerned, you have [to take precautions] no matter where you live. Something can happen anywhere. Everything is in God's control; it has been planned out for each person."

A Richmond Hill synagogue and billboards marking the site of a planned community campus were struck by anti-Semitic vandals last week.

Swastikas and SS lightning bolts were spray-painted in two-foot-high letters on a building housing the congregation of Chabad Lubavitch of Richmond Hill at Bathurst Street and Elgin Mills Road as well as on a sign outside the new Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus at Bathurst and Weldrick Road. The incidents took place in the early morning hours between Aug. 31 and Sept.1. Officers gathered evidence at the two crime scenes and Constable Don Yirenkyi of York Regional Police said the events are being treated as related hate crimes.

Rabbi Mendel Bernstein of Chabad Lubavitch Richmond Hill said members of the congregation discovered the graffiti when they arrived for morning prayers. Three of the synagogue's windows were affected.

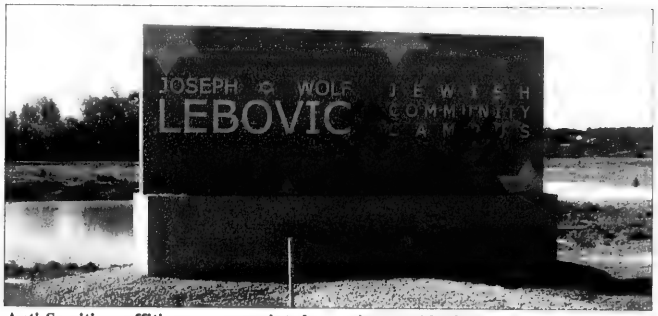
Reaction among the congregation was mixed. "We felt it should be reported and it brought to mind minor incidents of jeering when [congregants] walk to shul on shabbes," he said.

The congregation took the incident "in stride," he continued. "We figure all it takes is a kid with a spray can. It doesn't take much more than that."

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said there was no evidence to link the incident to any other local or international events.

"There are times we can tie spikes in anti-Semitic or anti-Muslim incidents to events in the wide world," he said, "but these [kind of events] are always going on.

"It's another day in the life of the Jewish community."



Anti-Semitic graffiti was spray-painted on a sign outside the new Jewish community campus at Bathurst and Weldrick Road last week.

Rudner noted that about a month ago, eight UJA Federation signs on Bathurst near Highway 401 were also vandalized. Later an individual drew anti-Semitic slogans in chalk on the sidewalk in front of a synagogue in the Bathurst and Lawrence area where several Orthodox Jews were praying. A 32-year old Toronto man has been charged with three counts of mischief in connection with that incident.

Rudner noted that while these sorts of events don't happen every day, "it's like a constant drip, drip, drip. It's corrosive on our community. No community should have to put up with this kind of garbage."

Anyone with information about the recent incidents is asked to call York Regional Police at 905-881-1221, ext. 7723.

York police chief supports mission to Israel

After the vote, La Barge told reporters that he still "certainly" supports the mission to Israel. He added: "We took advantage of the opportunity – insisted on the opportunity – to meet with Palestinian authorities as well. We didn't go with the [intention] of just getting one side of the story."

He said the objective was to learn how Israel deals with crisis. Israel "has dealt with more bomb calls in one month than we do in a year."

And he touched on police solidarity the world over: "Remember, we are brother and sister police officers regardless of whether here in Canada or Israel or in Palestine."

Barrow said the board is in favour of professional development "anywhere in the world," and that the Mideast conflict is outside the board's purview.

Similar complaints have been lodged with the police chief of Hamilton, who also took part in the mission to Israel, and with the OPP. Recently, Toronto Police Chief Bill Blair had to fend off criticism from Muslim and Arab groups for having taken part in this year's Walk for Israel.

Canada backs move for UN to mark Holocaust

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada has signed on to a letter to UN Secretary General Kofi Annan asking the General Assembly to consider setting aside a special day to mark the Holocaust.

The letter requests that the proposal be added to the agenda of the upcoming 60th session of the General Assembly and it urges member states to co-sponsor it.

Ed Morgan

"In doing so, member states will demonstrate their commitment to the cause of Holocaust remembrance and education, act to help prevent future acts of genocide and advance the fulfilment by the United Nations of its core mission and founding principles," the letter states.

A draft resolution included in the letter suggests Jan. 27, the anniversary of the 1945 liberation of Auschwitz by Soviet forces, be set aside as "an annual International Day of Commemoration in memory of the victims of the Holocaust"

The draft resolution also:

- urges UN member states "to develop educational programs that will inculcate future generations with the lesson of the Holocaust in order to prevent future acts of genocide;"
- rejects Holocaust denial;
- commends states that preserve sites used by the Nazis to implement the Holocaust;
- condemns religious intolerance, incitement, harassment or violence;
- requests that the secretary general establish an outreach program with the suggested name "Holocaust and the United Nations," as well as taking measures to mobilize civil society for Holocaust remembrance and education.

Letter requests proposal be added to agenda of upcoming General Assembly session

The government of Israel authored the draft resolution and more than 30 European countries have supported it. Canada recently joined Australia, Russia and the United States in signing on to the Israeli initiative.

Canadian Jewish Congress applauded Canada's support for the proposal.

In a letter to Foreign Affairs Minister Pierre Pettigrew, Congress president Ed Morgan stated,"The Canadian act very appropriately caps your personal participation at the UN's 60th anniversary commemoration of the liberation of the camps this past January. We look forward to Canada taking an active role in helping ensure the resolution will attract the support of all member states."

Last January, the UN General Assembly convened a special session to commemorate the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Nazi death camps.

Mission to Israel stirs interest among First Nations

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A forest fire has spread across Manitoba reaching south to Oklahoma and even as far away as Brazil.

Although no trees were actually destroyed in the conflagration, Rev. Pastor Raymond McLean believes the vivid imagery is the best way to describe the widespread interest in a recently completed aboriginal mission to Israel.

News of this year's visit to Israel is spreading fast in native communities – like a "domino effect, or a chain reaction" – Rev. McLean said. People in Thompson, in Manitoba's far north, have inquired about it and expressed interest in joining next year's trip, the fourth he will participate in. People in New Brunswick, Alberta, Saskatchewan and even a caller from Oklahoma have all heard about the Holy Land visit and want to sign on, he said.

And why not? This year's trip, which attracted 44 participants, offered everything from spiritual sustenance to political discourse on topics near and dear to the hearts of Canadian native leaders, he said.

Speaking by telephone from Winnipeg, Rev. McLean, pastor at the First Nations Family Worship Centre, said, "There's no place like Israel. When I went the first time, I was so overtaken by everything, the land and the people."

People back home quickly become enthusiastic when he describes the trip and they yearn to visit "the Holy Land of the Bible."

On the most recent trip, which spanned eight days in mid-August, several native leaders joined evangelical ministers, educators and others on the trip. Grand Chief Dr. Sydney Garrioch of the Manitoba Keewatnook Ininew Okimowin, Grand Chief Arnold Ouskan, Keewatin Tribal Council, and Chief David Harper of the Garden Hill First Nation, were among the dignitaries. Altogether, Manitoba tribal elders representing the Saulteaux, Ojibway, Cree, Oji-Cree and Sioux people took part in the trip. They were joined by Alan Yusim, midwest regional director of B'nai Brith Canada, who served as facilitator.

Participants in the solidarity mission were moved by their visits to the Western Wall, the remains of the Antonia Fortress, where Jesus was whipped, and the Way of the Cross, Rev. McLean said.

They were feted by the mayors of Haifa and Jerusalem and

> 'When I went the first time, I was so overtaken by everything' they visited the Knesset where they were greeted by an Israeli parliamentarian with responsibility for visiting Christian groups.

Mission participants also took the opportunity to discuss issues of interest to both Israelis and natives, including housing and cultural retention.

"We can identify with the Jewish people as going through the same phase in history," Rev. McLean said.

Both peoples suffered oppression and murder and both have been painted as "the bad guys."

Native leaders admired the ability of the Jews to maintain their culture.

"We were so amazed that Israelis were able to revive their native tongue, the same language that was spoken 3,000 years ago." Canadian natives can learn from that, as young aboriginals often have little connection to their language heritage, he added.

"The main attraction" of Israel, he continued, "is that it's a country that came from nothing. It was desolate."

Yusim said the first visit to Israel by Manitoba natives was sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada in the aftermath of the David Ahenakew incident. In December 2002, Ahenakew, a former native leader, made remarks about Jews that eventually led to his conviction for promoting hatred. The 2003 trip was followed by anti-hate programming designed to bring Jewish and native peoples closer together, he said.

In 2004 and 2005, McLean led his own groups to Israel. The recently concluded trip was billed as the "Stand with Israel" mission and consisted of a coalition of the New Allied Christian Caucus for Israel and the League of First Nations Leaders, Yusim noted.

"It is important to stress that these First Nations leaders and members of the Christian caucus came to Israel on their own accord and took a vocal stand with Israel and expressed clearly their opposition to anti-Semitism, both in their own communities and around the world," he said.

Rev. McLean said Ahenakew's outbursts don't represent the views of native peoples, adding he'd like to put the Ahenakew incident "behind us. I want good to overshadow that."

After the group's return to Canada, news of the visit spread quickly. The Oklahoma pastor told him there was nothing like it in his area and suggested Manitoba natives were serving as "a role model for them," Rev. McLean said.

A Canadian evangelist in South America, who is Rev. McLean's friend, even suggested he'd spread word of the trip to congregations in Brazil.

Rev. McLean is optimistic the trip will be back bigger than ever next year.

"We might have to book a jumbo plane," he quipped.

Canadian seeks to have Israel, PA join La Francophonie

Proposal aims to help Mideast peace process

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

The government of Canada recently proposed to the leaders of La Francophonie that the State of Israel and the Palestinian Authority become members of the Paris-based organization, which is made up of some 55 countries and states that share French as a language.

"The possibility of their becoming members will depend on the interest shown by the two parties," Jacques Saada, the federal minister responsible for La Francophonie, said in an interview.

There are three reasons for the proposal, he said.

The first is that the State of Israel has been marginalized by international authorities for too long. "This is absolutely unacceptable and counterproductive. We must send a clear signal: the State of Israel would be welcome in a multilateral organization like La Francophonie," Saada said.

The second reason is that the Palestinian Authority is leading an entity that will one day become a state in its own right. "I think La Francophonie can effectively pave the way for the Palestinian Authority to begin to participate in the organization's activities."

The third reason is that Canada believes membership of Israel and the Palestinian Authority in La Francophonie would be an asset in bringing the two opposing parties together.

"I think we must seize any opportunity to bring together the two parties. The very fact that they could one day be seated at the same table within the framework of a multilateral body – though we have not yet reached that point – can only be favourable. But I am a realist. I don't believe that this can happen tomorrow. However, at some point we must begin to show our confidence in that region and in the ability of Israel and the Palestinian Authority, and consequently the Arab countries, to adhere once and for all to the basic resolution adopted by the United Nations in November 1947, which provided for two states, a Jewish Israeli one and a Palestinian Arab one living side by side in peace."

Jacques Saada

According to Saada, Canada's proposal rests on one basic idea: peace in the Middle East is not likely to be attained until Israel has secured its borders through negotiation, and its security is therefore no longer threatened; and also until a Palestinian state has become a country living in complete security.

"By using this basic idea, La Francophonie, which has become increasingly political since 1997, will be able to bring added value to the Israeli-Palestinian peace process."

Israel is a full-fledged state recognized by the international community, but can the Palestinian Authority, which does not yet have the status of a state or a country, become a full-fledged member of La Francophonie?

"There are specific statutes within La Francophonie that would allow for the membership of the Palestinian Authority. There are other groups that sit as members of this international francophone organization without being countries. One example is the Val d'Aoste, a region of Italy that has quite a large francophone minority," Saada explained.

Some one million Israelis – a quarter of the country's population – are francophones. What is the proportion of francophones in the Palestinian Authority? Does it meet the membership criteria of La Francophonie?

"The number of francophones living in the Palestinian territories is difficult to establish. The Palestinian Authority's numbers are not very precise. But I believe that there must be a fairly large number. La Francophonie has already welcomed some countries, like Greece, that don't have a huge proportion of francophones. New member countries are expected to promote the French language, especially at the university level – through programs like academic exchanges and facilitating contacts in the field of scientific research. However, I think the main thing is to determine the added value that La Francophonie could bring to the Middle East peace process."

Saada said several "positive and encouraging" signals coming out of the Middle East point to a less acrimonious situation in the region – the election of a new president for the Palestinian Authority; the withdrawal of Israel from Gaza and several settlements in the northern West Bank; the election in Lebanon of the party of the assassinated former prime minister, Rafik Hariri; Lebanon and Egypt's support at the last Francophonie summit for a resolution supporting the "road map" peace plan – a fundamental element.

"No one would be naïve or idealistic enough to believe that things are going well. That is not the case. On the other hand, there are some encouraging signs that we must not underestimate. It is not a question of being blind to the difficulties still to be overcome, which are enormous. It is a question of starting somewhere. We must clearly mark out the path to normalization. It is crucial to have the discourse of the State of Israel and the Palestinian Authority in international bodies once again become a normal discourse."

The French government and the secretary general of La Francophonie, Abou Diouf, welcomed the Canadian proposal.

Is Ottawa going to promote its proposal with the principals involved – the State of Israel and the Palestinian Authority?

"It is not for Canada to dictate to Israel and the Palestinian Authority that they should apply to La Francophonie. Israel has shown some interest in the past, and again recently. The Israeli authorities have asked me about La Francophonie. It was not a formal step, but rather an exploratory one, which I found extremely significant. I have not yet had a chance to speak to the Palestinian Authority about this. I may travel to the Middle East this fall, to discuss this project more thoroughly with the Israeli, Palestinian, Lebanese and Egyptian authorities," Saada said.

Will Canada propose a target date for Israel and the Palestinian Authority to join La Francophonie?

"The proposal is still in the planning stage. There is a lot of work to be done on the ground. What is most important to us is not to fall into the trap of focusing on an absolute date. In my opinion, a target date would guarantee failure. I prefer things to evolve logically, correctly, peacefully and in a way that no one is put in a position of failure. We must launch this initiative because if no one does, it will never happen. Canada is anxious to have La Francophonie boost the hope for peace in the Middle East, which we all share. We will examine this proposal carefully at the next Francophonie summit, which will take place in Bucharest, Romania, in the fall of 2006."

Montreal lawyer appointed to the Senate

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Yoine Goldstein, born on Bagg Street in Montreal's old Jewish neighbourhood, muses on what his poor immigrant parents would think of his being appointed a senator.

Working late in his 41st-floor downtown law office, Goldstein, 71, recalled that his long-deceased father and mother came here from a small Ukrainian shtetl in the 1920s and struggled for many years to buy a modest duplex.

"That background has kept me humble and appreciative of what Canada has offered me," he said.

Goldstein, who was named to the Senate last week, grew up in a Yiddish-speaking home and graduated from Baron Byng High School, which produced generations of notable Canadian Jews.

Goldstein is a highly respected bankruptcy lawyer and a much-honoured Jewish community leader in Montreal, nationally and internationally. He was president of the Montreal federation from 1995 to 1997, a recipient of the coveted Samuel Bronfman Medal in 1998, and a governor of the Jewish Agency. He was a member of the "emergency cabinet" of UIA Federations Canada a couple of years ago that evolved into the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy.

He will definitely be the Jewish senator from Quebec, a post that has become a tradition since the late Lazarus Phillips was sent to the upper chamber in 1968.

Goldstein's name was put forward by his friend Eric Bissell, a stalwart of B'nai Brith Canada, which actively promoted his nomination.

"With a community of 100,000 and 45 Quebec seats in the Senate, it's proportionally reasonable to have at least one person with an understanding of the community," Goldstein said.

With the anticipated retirement of Leo Kolber in January 2004 after 20 years, several well-known community members' names came up as contenders and the unofficial race was particularly intense between Goldstein and his successor as federation president, Stanley Plotnick, 65. B'nai Brith originally lobbied for one of its ex-presidents, Ted Greenfield, but backed Goldstein in the end.

Goldstein insists he was surprised, however, when Bissell told him he had put in his name. It was May 2004 and Goldstein and his wife Elaine were just back from Uzbekistan on an American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee mission. (Goldstein is the only Canadian on the JDC executive.)

Goldstein, who will sit as a Liberal, is firm that his is not a patronage appointment. "I have not been active with the party. I was briefly a member when Sheila Finestone was the MP for Mount Royal, and I contributed to Irwin Cotler's campaign, but I am not a Liberal fundraiser," he said.

His only brush with politics was in the late '70s when he was one of the three Montreal lawyers who led the first constitutional challenge of Bill 101, Quebec's language legislation.

Senator Yoine Goldstein

Goldstein intends to be a full-time senator, and will significantly reduce his workload at Goldstein, Flanz & Fishman and cut back most of his community activities. He will fulfill a commitment to assume the presidency of the Jewish Community Foundation of Montreal this month, and will remain co-chair of the Caravane de la Tolerance, an anti-racism program in Quebec schools.

Goldstein admits that he, like many Canadians, was skeptical of the relevance of the Senate, until 2003 when he served as special counsel on insolvency to its standing committee on banking.

"Going to Ottawa two or three times a week, for three or four months, I got to know and became very impressed with the quality of its work, especially in committee.

"The fact that senators are unelected is an advantage because they are a lot freer to express views without fear of having to keep their seat," he said.

He hopes to serve on committees where his legal expertise can be of use. (One of his major clients was the Reichmann family's failed Olympia & York, which he restructured.)

The Torah protects the dignity of all

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

The rabbis sometimes uncover subtle lessons of human dignity in the details of the mitzvot.

In this week's parshah, Shoftim, the Torah describes army exemptions. A person is exempt from army service if he has built a new house and not yet lived in it, planted a vineyard and not yet begun to eat its fruits, or become betrothed to a woman and not yet married. The Torah gives a reason as to why these men should be exempt from their army service – so that another should not live in the house they built, reap the fruits of their new field or marry their young wife.

Rabbinic Reflections

Rashi explains this on the basis of compassion – you feel rotten seeing all the effort put into this new house, the work done to plant this new vineyard, the emotion of this new wife, and then seeing this young man die in battle. You feel bad when you see an abrupt end to efforts and to joy. The army exemptions are based on feelings of disappointment at efforts incomplete, emotions unfulfilled.

The Ramban explains the exemptions as an army general – these soldiers are going to be distracted, and therefore they will be lousy soldiers. They will be thinking of their home lives and will be bad soldiers.

Oh, yes, I forgot one of the exemptions – if one is scared, is faint-hearted, he too should return home. And the Torah gives the reason – so that he will not demoralize the other soldiers.

The Talmud records Rabbi Yosi Hagalili's opinion. Why is this person scared to go into battle? Because he has sinned. He knows that the world is guided by the Master of the universe and he knows that he has sinned. He is concerned that if he is put into a vulnerable situation in war, he will not have Divine protection because he really doesn't deserve it. So he is scared.

And the Torah tells him that he may go home. But don't think that these people with exemptions had to register their exemptions with their sergeants. The kohen would announce that all those who would like to avail themselves of their exemption could leave – so the owner of the new home or vineyard, the newly engaged and the one who is scared because of his sins, they would all leave at once.

Imagine if you had to declare your exemption – "I am leaving because of my sins." People would be turning this over in their minds – I wonder what he did, must be a doozy if he is leaving… But the exemptions are not declared out loud, and all those who wish to do so leave together.

And you, the other soldiers, would never know who is leaving because of their sins and who is leaving because of their new home. Human dignity is thereby protected. If 20 people all leave at once, you will never know the sinner because he leaves together with the others.

And look, by the way, at who the Torah is protecting – it is protecting the sinner.

In a very subtle manner, by mixing him together with other exemptions, the Torah teaches us that the dignity of the sinner ought to be protected.

Such is the value of the dignity of all human beings.

Never Again: the Jewish community and Darfur

By JONATHAN LASKI

Guest Voice

On Jan. 20, 1942, leaders of the Nazi regime convened the Wannsee Conference to plan their solution to the "Jewish problem." As history has recorded, they were largely successful in their evil undertaking.

But some European Jews did survive and since then, Jewish identity has become synonymous with the term "Never again"– a pledge that the kind of evil felled upon our families, communities and religion will not threaten the existence of another people.

Our widespread apathy toward the genocides of today threatens our credibility. As Nobel Peace Prize-winner Elie Wiesel said, "The opposite of love is not hate, it's indifference. The opposite of art is not ugliness, it's indifference. The opposite of faith is not heresy, it's indifference. And the opposite of life is not death, it's indifference."

The genocide currently taking place in Darfur, Sudan – where Arab janjaweed militias equipped and trained by the Sudanese government are killing, torturing and raping civilians, razing their villages and forcing two million people into refugee camps rife with the preconditions of famine and disease – is the issue Jews are failing to address.

What we Canadian Jews have failed to realize is that people facing genocide today are intricately connected to us – they are almost extensions of our own Jewish history from 60 years ago, and as such, we have a special duty to fight for them. In fact, I would argue that the Jewish community has the opportunity to do something about the genocide in Darfur, which is far more important than contributing Nobel laureates or producing doctors, lawyers and entrepreneurs. By fighting tirelessly for the people of Darfur and stopping the genocide before the bureaucratic global community gets around to it, we can be the first religious, ethnic or social group since our families were victims in the Shoah to put an end to a genocide. This can be done by demanding that representatives from our schools, synagogues and federations speak out in classrooms and from bimahs, and use every resource possible to affirm that although very few stood up to fight for us, we will do better.

There are organizations working to raise awareness on the streets and in the synagogues, and to stir the hallowed halls of Parliament in Ottawa. The Canadian Jewish Congress has made concerted efforts to help and student organizations, such as STAND Canada (Students Taking Action Now: Darfur), are taking up arms against acquiescence and apathy on the part of young Canadians.

There are no excuses for indifference – not because the genocide is being orchestrated in a faraway land or because the rogue government is Muslim, the militia groups are Arab and their victims tribal Africans. I would argue that this two-year-long genocide is neither exclusively a Canadian issue nor an international issue, nor is it a black issue or a white one. It is, however, very much a Jewish issue.

In every instance that we invoke the "Never again" pledge, in our Yom Hashoah commemorations and CJN-published journal entries of March of the Living participants, we implicate ourselves further to actually do more than utter these words and mark them for empty cliché. Darfur is very much a Jewish issue, as these post-Holocaust years provide the litmus test for our social conscience and determination on one hand and our indifference and hypocrisy on the other.

In historical terms, we are not very far past the time of the Shoah. In 500 years, historians will record the war years from 1939 to '45 and today as the same era. Will we be remembered simply as people who worked with ruach to rebuild our own communities from the ashes of the Holocaust, or as more – as a group who fought against the destruction of other cultures and as a community who said "Never again" and actually meant it?

Jonathan Laski is the media relations director of Students Taking Action Now: Darfur (STAND Canada).

A memoir by Israel's Amos Oz

A Tale of Love and Darkness* by Amos Oz, Harcourt Inc.

Amos Oz was an only child. When he was 12½ years old, his mother committed suicide. She was 38, introspective and romantic, an intellectual who had studied philosophy in a Prague university until she was driven out by anti-Semitism. Her parents had been murdered by the Nazis. She couldn't reconcile herself to the rough, pioneer way of life in a strange and harsh milieu.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Her son writes, "She might have been able to grit her teeth and endure hardship and loss, poverty, or the cruelty of married life. But what she couldn't stand, it seems to me, was the tawdriness."

Until now, Oz has never written about his unhappy mother. Nor had he and his father ever discussed it: "From the day of my mother's death to the day of my father's death 20 years later, we did not talk about her once. Not a word. As if she had never lived. As if her life was just a censured page torn from a Soviet encyclopedia."

Oz's father was Odessa educated, highly learned and ambitious. But, instead of a university appointment, he had to settle for a humbling lesser position at the National Library. His unkind son suggests that his father, pedantic, small-minded, given to foolish jokes and anti-religious platitudes, may never have managed "to reconcile himself to his own mediocrity."

In the wake of his mother's death, the author rejected family tradition. He changed his surname from Klausner to Oz (something which particularly distressed his father), attended a rural school and became a member of Kibbutz Hulda in Israel.

Starting out as a strident nationalist, a follower of the political right, Oz was eventually transformed into a pragmatic dove. It was also at the kibbutz that his vocation of a writer became clear and even insistent.

The first part of this lengthy, discursive memoir is a kind of requiem for the past. Much of it is a detailed, many-sided recital of the eastern European life of his forebears.

The second part is an intricate and absorbing account of the years of the waning British Mandate for Palestine and a close and intimate portrait of Jerusalem during the first difficult and wonder-filled years of the State of Israel.

What was it like to live in a country that, since its inception, has been constantly under threat? What about the painful relationship between Arab and Jew? Oz writes, "It is mere wishful thinking to imagine that the persecuted and the oppressed will unite out of solidarity and man the barricades together against a ruthless oppressor… Often each sees in the other not as a partner in misfortune but in fact as the image of their own common oppressor."

Arabs, Oz says, see Israeli Jews as not "a bunch of half-hysterical survivors but a new offshoot of Europe, with its colonialism, technical sophistication and exploitation that has cleverly returned to the Middle East," while Israelis see Arabs not as "fellow victims" but as "pogrom-making Cossacks, bloodthirsty anti-Semites, Nazis in disguise, as if our European persecutors have reappeared here in the Land of Israel, put keffiyahs on their heads and grown moustaches, but they are still our old murderers interested only in slitting Jews' throats for fun."

The writer who attempts to write his autobiography is, Oz suggests, like a man who "knocks on the door of a house where he is a regular visitor and where he is used to being very warmly received, but when the door opens, a stranger suddenly looks out at him and recoils in surprise, as though asking, 'Who are you, sir, and why exactly are you here?'"

The reader of this wise and luminous life story discovers who Oz is and why he is Israel's best known and much loved author.

Rambam's 800th yahrzeit

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Philosopher. Codifier. Mystic. Physician. It's hard to know how to describe the Rambam. This giant of Jewish thought passed away 800 years ago. As I did last week in commemoration of the 900th anniversary of the passing of Rashi, I present some wonderful sites to appreciate, understand and honour the wisdom of the Rambam.

The Rambam, (an acronym for Rabbi Moshe ben Maimon – also known by his Greek name, Maimonides) was born in Cordoba, Spain, in 1135. He eventually settled in Morocco and then in Egypt. There are many excellent online biographies including Chabad's [http://tinyurl.com/d4f46] and Wikipedia's. [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Maimonides] The department for Jewish Zionist Education has put together a comprehensive page with links to sites about the Rambam. [www.jafi.org.il/education/history/rambam.html]

In honour of the Rambam anniversary, the Jewish National and University Library at the Hebrew University has scanned several ancient early editions of his works. The highlights are two manuscripts of Mishnah commentary in his own handwriting. I must add a personal note here. In this era, where you do and see practically anything on the Internet, I gasped when I realized that I was looking at the Rambam's 800-year-old handwritten manuscript right on my screen. [http://tinyurl.com/8hwop] (Note: In order to view the manuscript, you will need to download the free program DjVU. You will find the link at the University site.)

Last October, 60 rabbis, including the two chief rabbis of Israel and Canada's Rabbi Amram Assayag, travelled to Cordoba to commemorate the anniversary. Rabbi Assayag's webpage and article, "Reclaiming Maimonides," tells of this historic mission. [http: //tinyurl.com/9ad64]

One of the Rambam's masterworks is the Mishneh Torah, or review of the Torah. It covers the entire breadth of philosophical and legal topics that are the foundation of traditional Judaism. Torah.org presents annotated selections from the Mishneh Torah as well as special online classes about the Rambam's writing on Purim, the seder and the role of Eliyahu at a brit milah. [www.torah.org/learning/rambam]

The Rambam composed The Thirteen Principles of Faith, found in many siddurim after the Shacharit service. [http://members.aol.com/LazerA/13yesodos.html] You are probably familiar with one of his principles without even realizing it. The 11th principle is the basis of the popular tune Ani Maamin. Here's the English translation: "I believe with a complete belief/ In the coming of the Messiah/ And even though he may tarry/ I will wait for him, whenever he comes."

You can read the Hebrew words and sing along. [http://tinyurl.com/9srkm]

The Rambam is also known for his famous "tzedakah ladder", which ranks levels of charity. The highest rung, according to the Rambam, is reached when you help prevent someone from becoming poor by giving them a job or teaching them a trade. [www.tzedaka.org]

Here are some quotes from the Rambam you may not be familiar with:

- Teach your tongue to say "I do not know" and you will progress.
- No disease that can be treated by diet should be treated with any other means.
- The risk of a wrong decision is preferable to the terror of indecision. [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Maimonides]

It is hard to imagine how, on top of his other duties, the Ramabam also had time to practise medicine. While living in Cairo, he was appointed personal physician to the Grand Vizier Alfadal and Sultan Salaldin. Jewish medical students may be familiar with the Oath of Maimonides which speaks of the relationship between physician, patient and God. It concludes, "God, You have appointed me to watch over the life and death of Your creatures: here I am, ready for my vocation." Although the oath is credited to the Rambam, others suggest that it was composed by Marcus Herz, an 18th-century German physician. It first appeared in print in 1793. [http://tinyurl.com/7ceva]

Both the Rambam's and Rashi's anniversaries are being commemorated by the minting of special coins by the Israel Government Coins and Medals Corp. The Rashi set depicts the commentator studying Talmud and includes the quote "My whole essence is the explanation of the Bible." [http://tinyurl.com/9v7l6] The Rambam's coins shows him writing with his right hand and feeling the pulse of a sick child with his left, accompanied by the quote "Accept the truth from the one who says it." [http://tinyurl.com/9x7j7]

Coast to Coast

Media agree: Abbas must make the next move

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

For Britain's Guardian newspaper, finding a good word to say about Israel is virtually impossible, even after Israel has just undergone a historic, if wrenching, unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and the northern West Bank.

"Mr. Sharon will no doubt argue," wrote the Guardian, "that Gaza has been a 'painful concession' for which the Palestinians must now reciprocate, but [the Israelis] should not be allowed to get away with that." (Guardian Weekly, Aug. 26-Sep. 1).

Yet even the Guardian grudgingly conceded that Palestinian leader Mahmoud Abbas "must respond" by turning Gaza into what it calls a "test-bed," the "precursor for a future Palestinian state."

Surprisingly, it also agreed that even Israel's expectation that a Palestinian-controlled Gaza not pose a security threat is "a reasonable demand." To that end, Abbas must rein in the "militants" and rebuild the Gaza economy.

In short, Abbas and the Palestinian Authority must assume the sort of responsibility that comes with effective political leadership.

If a paper normally as critical of Israel as the Guardian can recognize that the next move is Abbas's, it is a significant development in international (meaning mainly European) thinking about Israeli-Palestinian relations.

On this side of the Atlantic, the mainstream media have shown a greater understanding of Israel's precarious position in the Middle East. Accordingly, there has been more willingness to place the onus on the Palestinians.

The Aug. 28 suicide bombing in Be'er Sheva that injured 48 Israelis – a terrorist attack claimed by both Islamic Jihad and the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigades – led immediately to increased pressure on Abbas to fulfil his obligations under the internationally backed "road map" peace plan to dismantle the "terrorist capabilities and infrastructure."

In his Globe and Mail article of Aug. 29, Mark McKinnon became one of very few journalists to actually quote this requirement from the road map document. He made it clear that this is not simply an Israeli demand, as it is often portrayed, but an international stipulation. McKinnon also pointed out Israel's obligations: to freeze all settlement construction and dismantle illegal outposts.

However, in his Aug. 25 piece, "Israel to seize Arab land next to Jerusalem," MacKinnon contentiously noted: "On the same day the world heaped praise on Israel for pulling out of the Gaza Strip, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon announced plans to seize Palestinian land east of Jerusalem."

Technically, this is land claimed by the Palestinians for their future state. Its status remains to be determined in negotiations and so cannot, without qualification, be called "Palestinian."

By contrast, Greg Myre in the Aug. 25 New York Times was accurate in writing that Israel had issued orders concerning "West Bank land," thereby leaving aside the disputed issue of ownership.

Meanwhile, several critics saw Israel's disengagement from Gaza as a ploy to retain all of the West Bank. As analysts in the West and in Israel observed, the timing of Sharon's Aug. 25 announcement was harmful to Israel's efforts to shift the focus of responsibility to the Palestinians.

On Aug. 29, Sharon appeared on Israeli TV and said that in any comprehensive peace agreement with the Palestinians, Israel would have to relinquish some West Bank settlements while retaining major settlements near Jerusalem. This seemed to dissipate some of the criticism.

On Aug. 28, Israeli novelist and essayist Amos Oz was awarded Frankfurt's prestigious Goethe prize for excellence in literature. This is a very significant development in the recognition of Israeli culture by the German intellectual community. (Unfortunately the event was overlooked by most of the western media.)

In his acceptance address, Oz attacked post-modern relativism, which denies the existence of evil. "Post-modernism," he said, "absolved whole groups of responsibility… In the global kindergarten there is no one responsible anymore, except the establishment."

Oz's words have a special resonance in this period of international Islamist terrorism, whose supporters and apologists invariably blame the West – and Israel – for terrorists' outrages.

Obituary

Citizenship judge remembered for community involvement

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Sigmund Reiser

Longtime community leader Sigmund Reiser, a native of Poland who immigrated to Canada in 1949 and filled his post-retirement years with high-level community involvement including work as a citizenship court judge, died Aug. 25 at age 81 after a lengthy illness.

After spending his initial time in Canada doing factory work and taking English classes at night, Reiser built a successful career in the insurance business, living in Winnipeg and Montreal before settling in Toronto. He became London Life's leading Canadian sales agent, and later a regional manager.

Last year Reiser was honoured at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, where he was an active member, and funding was inaugurated for the Sigmund Reiser Fund for Truth and Justice in Race Relations.

Reiser is likely already running things in heaven, surmised his grandson Jonathan Guberman in an affectionate eulogy at the funeral. Guberman recalled his grandfather as a great organizer and devoted family man who would often take him to the museum or Science Centre and spend time with him afterward learning about what they had seen.

> 'He was a man who had stared in the face of the very worst that humanity had to offer, and survived it'

"He was a man who had stared in the face of the very worst that humanity had to offer, and survived it. Perhaps as a reaction to it, he sought out and reveled in, the very best that humanity has to offer," said Guberman.

Following World War II, when he was in Russia, Reiser found himself one of only two surviving members of his extended family of 21 people. He spent several years postwar in refugee camps in Germany.

An encounter with two representatives of a volunteer organization shortly after his arrival in Canada inspired him to become involved in community work later in life. The two volunteers he met more than 50 years ago bought food for Reiser, his wife and son at the Montreal train station and provided them with some needed spending money.

Reiser's organizational involvements included State of Israel Bonds, B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, Canadian Jewish Congress and the Jewish National Fund. He was a member of the discipline committee of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario and the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC), and also served as campaign manager for two Liberal members of parliament, Robert Kaplan in 1988 and Art Eggleton in 1993 and 1998.

He served twice as an international election observer-monitor in Bosnia and represented the CHRC at a seminar seven years ago in Warsaw about the evolution of human rights and democracy in the former Soviet Union.

In 1997, he became a member of the Order of Canada, in recognition of his volunteer work.

Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth, said at the funeral that in his letter of recommendation for that award, he wrote that Reiser was "a man with great initiative, drive and energy who works hard himself and gets others to do likewise so that the project or program he is involved with becomes a successful one."

Recalling Reiser's ongoing involvement with Beth Emeth, Rabbi Kelman said Reiser was "not afraid to be original" and make celebrations unique.

"He was able to be very much a part of both worlds, the Jewish world and the Canadian world," Rabbi Kelman told The CJN.

As a citizenship judge, Reiser spoke to thousands of children in public schools about Canadian values, the rabbi noted.

Reiser is survived by his wife Carole, son Benjamin, daughter Felice Guberman, six grandchildren and five great-grandchildren.

Registration for Taglit - birthright israel: Canada Israel Experience trips opens

Canada Israel Experience, the largest Canadian provider of Taglit-birthright israel trips, has announced that it will send 600 young Jewish adults on free, first-time, educational trips to Israel for the sixth consecutive year.

Taglit– birthright israel is an innovative partnership of the Government of Israel, North American Jewish Federations through the United Jewish Communities (UJC), and leading private philanthropists.

This trip includes round-trip airfare and full accommodations. The 10-day trips are designed to introduce Canadian youth to Jewish life and to diminish the growing division between Israel and Jewish communities around the world.

Registration for the trips will be available online beginning Sept. 8 at www.israelforfree.com at 9:00 a.m. Eastern Standard time.

Canada Israel Experience (CIE) has been maintaining a tradition of excellence in preserving the highest of educational, logistical and safety standards for Canadian Jewish youth in Israel.

CIE works toward its goal of strengthening Jewish identity among Jewish youth and young adults through participation in meaningful Israel Experience programs.

CIE is a non profit organization funded by local UJA/CJA Federations across Canada. It plays an active role within the Jewish federation system and is the only Canadian tour orgnizer that maintains a national network of local Israel Experience representatives.

Since its inception in 2000, Taglit- birthright israel has given over 88,000 young Jewish adults world wide including 12,000 Canadians with a free trip to Israel.

"The 10-day birthright israel CIE program remains a life altering experience for its participants, building a bridge to Jewish identity and sparking dramatic involvement in local Jewish community" says Edward Prutshci, a program alumnus.

"Because of the trip, my connection to Judaism became real…I experienced something spiritual with people my age from all over the world" claims Alanna Snitman, also a program alumna.

The experience of the free gift to Israel includes a sunrise at Masada, touring the historic Old City of Jerusalem, hiking in the Golan Heights, relaxing in ancient Roman hot springs, archeological digging in the Israeli desert, partying in Israeli nightclubs and meeting fellow participants from around Canada and the world…making it a true lifetime experience.

"In only ten action packed days, we traveled through 3000 years of Jewish History," says Taglit-birthright israel alumnus Phil Rabin.

NEWS, NEWS, NEWS

BEAUTY NEWS: Autumn brings warm and frosty colours to the palette with smoky eyes and natural pink lips. You'll see shades of white, pink, green/blue, chocolate brown and, of course, purple. Fragrances are floral, luxurious and seductive. Glosses that shimmer and dazzle are a must-have for this season.

MAURICE FIORIO of Toronto's Fiorio Beauty Academy says that as autumn approaches, the cooler weather will bring changes in fashion and beauty.

When it comes to hair, richness and texture are the main buzz words. For colour, auburns and reds are hot. Chunky highlights are becoming less emphasized, while tone-on-tone colour is taking over. Many people are subtly going darker by richening their current tone to create depth.

When it comes to cut and styling, long and wavy is the way to go. Length should be anywhere from shoulder length to mid-back. Fringes are still very popular, yet this fall there will be emphasis on long fringes. Stylists can create texture by using "scrunch"-type gels and creams that will highlight layers and give dimension to the cut.

After a full summer of sun, an exfoliating treatment facial will be necessary. Dead skin cells will have built up on the surface from extended sun exposure, and will need to be removed for a fresh, clean look for fall.

Dressing up the Trendy way

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

Women looking for an all-in-one clothing and accessory store can find the answer at the Trendy Accessories (or Trendy as it's known) boutique, a store that offers its customers personal service and unique items every time.

It's a funky store full of beautiful things, and co-owners Judy Revai and Aggie Laszlo take great pride in the wide selection of merchandise available and the fact that every woman will be able to find a one-of-a-kind item to make her own.

"We try to be more unique than other boutiques by buying special items – both clothing and accessories. We travel a lot and hand-pick all of our merchandise," Revai said.

In 1992, Revai and Laszlo, who have individually been involved in fashion for many years, opened Trendy in a corner of the large Family Warehouse store in Lawrence Plaza at the corner of Lawrence Avenue and Bathurst Street.

At the beginning, they sold only earings but as business grew, they added more jewelry, and eventually hats.

Family Warehouse closed in 1996 and the two women took a risk and decided to open up on their own in one of the small stores in the same plaza.

They rented out half the store to a friend who sold clothing and used the rest of the store for their accessories.

In 2004 when their friend decided to leave the boutique, Laszlo and Revai took another risk and added clothing to their merchandise, not by taking over the sale of their friend's clothes, but by buying their own.

Today, they stock Sandwich clothing from Holland, Rinascimento from Italy and Spanner from Canada, in addition to a number of lines from the United States.

One service provided by Trendy is personalized shopping where Laszlo and Revai choose clothing and accessories to suit each customer.

They also take pride in the fact that they cater to religious groups. They specialize in skirts and always have a large selection and variety.

Although they don't have evening wear, they do have "funky" accessories to go with such outfits and say that should anyone want personal attention in picking out the best items for an outfit, customers are welcome to phone and book an appointment or just come in for help.

"We're like family. People know us by name and we know them by name. Some people even come to the shop just to chat," Laszlo said.

For now, there is nothing else they would like to add to the store, as they believe that, aside from shoes, they really are a one-stop shop for fashionable women. Still, they don't rule out the idea of starting branches of Trendy in other areas and shopping centres.

"This is in the cards, but we are scared that with more stores, we will lose the special attention that makes the store so unique. We can't be in two places at once, and many of our clients have been with us for a long time and come especially for us," Laszlo said.

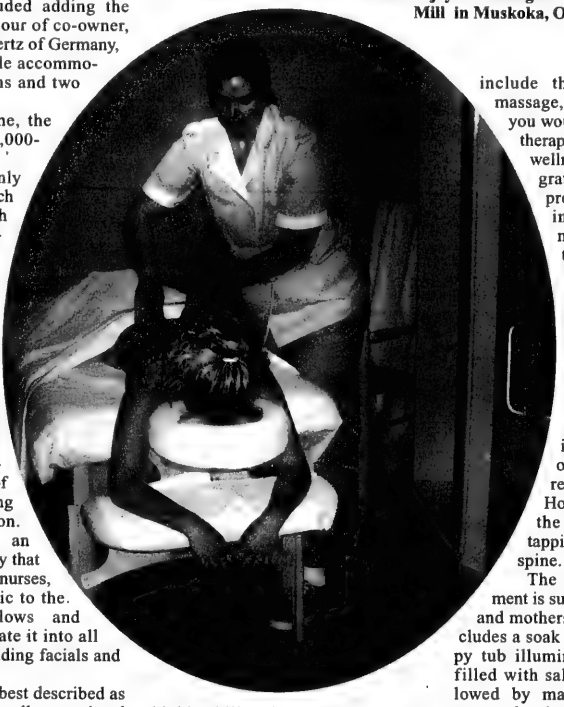
Avalon – The Spa at Christie's Mill

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Avalon – The Spa at Christie's Mill is a spacious, ultra-luxurious wellness spa in Muskoka on the shores of Gloucester Pool, the last stop on the Trent-Severn Waterway before the entrance to Georgian Bay.

The Inn at Christie's Mill has been catering to tourists for 45 years. In June 2004, the lakeside resort finished an $8-million expansion that included adding the Count Wing in honour of co-owner, Count Graf von Goertz of Germany, bringing the upscale accommodations to 45 rooms and two cottages.

A client enjoys a massage at The Spa at Christie's Mill in Muskoka, Ont. The resort opened the spa in June 2004.



At the same time, the resort opened its 7,000-square-foot spa.

"We are the only certified healing touch spa in Canada, which means all our therapists have had certified training in the healing touch program, an internationally recognized program brand endorsed by the Canadian and American Holistic Nurses," says Susanna Bany, spa manager and past director of the board of the Canadian Healing Touch Foundation. "Healing touch is an energy-based therapy that has been created by nurses, so it is very specific to the body's natural flows and rhythms. We integrate it into all our treatments including facials and pedicures."

The spa décor is best described as French country: the walls are painted in muted warm tones of taupe and sage green, the treatment rooms are done in pale gold. Adding to the elegance is wainscoting on the walls, and chandeliers and retail products displayed in antique shelved armoires and on shelves shaped as ladders – hand painted by Bany herself.

The spa has a manicure/pedicure area and seven therapy treatment rooms, including a room used for holistic procedures, which has a view of the pristine waters, and a couple's suite boasting a Jacuzzi room with shower and two adjoining massage rooms. The spa also includes an indoor saltwater mineral pool and saltwater hot tub. There are nine highly skilled therapists, including registered massage therapists, certified therapists, holistic therapists, estheticians and support staff.

"We use Phytomer products, an excellent skincare line from France. The reason we have chosen these products is that they are made from all-water plants, so it ties in with our thalaso and hydrotherapy theme. We are really concerned the products are natural and compatible with people's skin," Bany says.

Treatments include manicures, pedicures and facials; and body treatments in the form of wraps, massages and healing procedures such as Chakra-Crystal balance therapy and arthritis therapy. Specialty treatments include the Muskoka natural massage, which is akin to what you would expect at a physiotherapist clinic; the signature wellness massage that integrates healing touch, acupressure and reflexology in a light Swedish massage; and the Mystical Water Ride, where two therapists work in synchronization, starting with a massage, then exfoliating with Dead Sea Salts under a Vichy shower with multi showerheads, culminating in a moisturizing healing treatment of acupressure points, reflexology and ancient Hopi Indian technique on the back consisting of a tapping sensation down the spine.

The Couple's Suite treatment is suited to couples, friends and mothers and daughters. It includes a soak in a large hydrotherapy tub illuminated with light and filled with salts and minerals, followed by massages in adjoining rooms, then back into the tub, ending with a snack of fruit and cheese in the suite.

Kosher meals or other dietary choices can be ordered in advance, and guests who bring their own kosher meals to Christie's Mill can eat their food in the dining room or by the pool.

Some packages are available for individuals or groups.

Other activities at the inn include canoeing, paddleboats, shuffleboard, tennis courts, outdoor Jacuzzis and golf nearby.

For more information, contact Avalon – The Spa at Christie's Mill in Port Severn at 1-800-465-9966 or online at www.christiemill.com.

Accessories for your dog and a handbag for you

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Ask a designer to name the most neglected areas in fashion, and you likely won't hear the words accessories and dogs spoken together. But that's the daring approach Josiane Benadi is adopting with her company Gigi and Gad, a line of belts and handbags for women and collars for their dog.

Entering the dog apparel market seemed a natural fit for Benadi, 25, a former resident of Montreal. Not only was she a dog owner, but she also had a passion to create the forgotten flourishes known as accessories. "They're the powerhouse of fashion companies," Benadi said from her home in Manhattan.

And dogs can be a girl's best friend, no matter how the cliché goes. Benadi gives the canine neck a glittery makeover with several dog collars adorned with bows and frill lace. Some collars look punk, some look cute.

"I like to mix fresh and funky colours without being over the edge. Basically, these collars have presence," she said.

So much so that some customers have bought the leashes for their cat.

Pet fashion is "a craze right now," Benadi has noticed. "Dogs are children to some people, so they spoil them." While this trend has been lagging in Canada, it's been hot in the United States.

Kim Shiffman, editor of City Dog magazine, supports the venture. "I think it's great because it gives people another way to love their dog," she said. "Inevitably, it means the dog is getting more attention."

"Everyone is really into it. They think it's cute," Benadi said.

Benadi is complemented by her business partner Gad Albilia, a 26-year-old Montreal Web developer who is quick to admit he admires Benadi's bold designs. By handling operations ranging from inventory control to imports to Web design, Albilia gives his partner time to craft fashions with the attention needed to perfect the smallest detail.

"Our main focus now is to build the brand," he said. "We're making key sales to get our name out."

Josiane Benadi and her shy canine friend.

Only a year old, Gigi and Gad is popping up on dog-apparel websites, further spreading word-of-mouth buzz. "We're taking small steps now," Albilia said. "To get a megastore in New York would be..." he trails off, as if lost in a businessman's fantasy.

Along with dog accessories, the company has items for the fashion-savvy female: textured handbags, thick belts, and shirts and sweaters emblazoned with the Gigi and Gad logo – a stylish long-legged hipster urbanite. Benadi described her as someone customers could relate to, even if they don't sport the fictional character's funky clothes.

"It's about creating a lifestyle," Benadi said.

And what does the future of Gigi and Gad look like?

"Hopefully, everyone will wear our products one day," Benadi answered.

Loss of an idol

By RANDI BERGMAN

Creating an idol is a very difficult task. Within the high-resolution images and perfectly constructed interviews, there is a fine, almost invisible line between just enough exposure and way too much.

It's the more than subtle difference between Chloe Sevigny and J.Lo, and what makes James Perse clothing fresher than Juicy Couture's. Treading too lightly or crossing this line has ruined one too many careers.

One fashion idol who is treading a little too lightly these days is the previously perfect (at least in my eyes) Sarah Jessica Parker. For the past few years, SJP has maintained her throne as fashion queen extraordinaire by staying front and centre on TV and just beneath the radar everywhere else.

While becoming the muse of designers and topping all the best-dressed lists, SJP remained one of those New York treasures that could best be appreciated with an acquired and intelligent taste. Nowadays, however, she is front and centre everywhere – all the time. In the past year, she has become the spokesperson for one of the most mainstream clothing empires of our time and branched into the fragrance world with her new perfume, Lovely.

I'd call her stint at Gap the testing period. Making high fashion accessible to the masses is a noble pursuit in my view. Her outfits were totally rad and she really succeeded in making the Gap cool again. While stepping a little into the mainstream, SJP kept her credibility intact. But she should have stopped there.

As much as it pains me to say this, the perfume really does bother me. How, exactly, can one bottle one's essence? And how or why is this even something to present to consumers? I fear that her latest endeavour has brought SJP to the danger point. Is she becoming just another Hollywood drone destined to bank on her fame until it's been as stretched out as a hair-elastic? The intangible nature of the perfume itself begs to have us ask if there is anywhere an idol won't go to make a little dough.

I hope that Sarah Jessica Parker isn't losing her magic touch. SJP was the quintessential icon because she appealed to everyone without losing her credibility. For every one of her teenybopper fans, there was a fashion student, a feminist and an alt-rocker to balance it out. The way things are going, SJP runs the risk of losing some of her original fans, and she will be left with a new generation of fans who will fall for the fluff and never appreciate the substance.

I'll probably continue my idol worship no matter what, but please Ms. Parker, hear my plea, leave perfumery to the classics. Chanel did it so much better.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Women in food industry get things All Stirred Up

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Five or six times a year, about 100 women get together and talk about everything that has to do with food.

They are members of the Women's Culinary Network, a group of about 300 women who work in every aspect of the food industry.

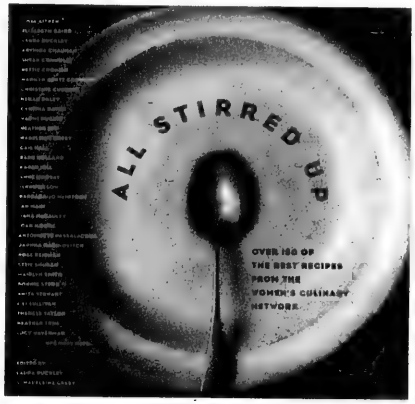
In addition to the potluck meetings where the women network, share professional experience, listen to speakers and socialize, they put out a directory and a newsletter, and about two years ago, came out with the cookbook All Stirred Up, a compilation of members' recipes.

Money received from the book – they got a grant from the International Olive Oil Council – will go towards funding scholarships for those entering the food industry.

Nettie Cronish, a vegetarian cook and cookbook author, is the network founder and current chair. It came about, she said, after a group of women worked together in a spa kitchen.

"When the spa closed, we decided that we had worked so well together we would continue our collaboration. The network has continued to grow.

"We now represent the mosaic that is Toronto. Our membership includes cooks, caterers, dietitians, food stylists – any profession within the culinary field."



When people get a culinary degree, she says, they do not necessarily have to work in a restaurant kitchen. "There are a lot of opportunities out there, and by coming together for our meetings women are able to see what other women are doing. They can make valuable connections. Jobs are born through taking the time to network and answer calls."

Cronish, a graduate of United Synagogue Day School, became vegetarian when she worked in Israel for a year after high school, and worked as an assistant to a vegetarian chef.

Over the years, she has taught vegetarian cooking classes, run a vegetarian deli in a health food store, operated a frozen vegetarian dinner company, written food columns and authored the books.

She developed her own recipes for her cookbooks, she says, and used professional recipe testers to test them.

"Chefs do things intuitively, but everything needs to be measured out. The testers, who may be experienced in baking or cooking, make sure the measurements are accurate, and that the recipes work."

Food definitely brings people together, says Cronish. "That is our hope for the future."

Here is a sampling of recipes from All Stirred Up.

1 tsp. olive oil
1 tsp. hot pepper sauce (optional)
1 tsp. minced garlic
½ tsp. minced fresh ginger
salt and pepper

Salad:
3½ cups chicken stock
1 cup wheatberries
½ cup thinly sliced green onions
½ cup thinly sliced carrots
½ cup each diced sweet green and red peppers
½ cup snow peas, sliced into thirds
8 oz. boneless skinless chicken breasts
salt and pepper
1 tbsp. toasted sesame seeds

Dressing: In bowl, whisk together vinegar, sesame oil, soy sauce, tahini, honey, lemon juice, olive oil, hot pepper sauce (if using), garlic and ginger. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Set aside.

Salad: In saucepan over high heat, bring stock to boil. Add wheatberries; reduce heat to low. Cook, covered, for about 45 minutes or until wheatberries are tender but chewy. Drain any excess liquid; let cool. Stir in green onions, carrots, green and red peppers and snow peas. Set aside.

With mallet or underside of heavy frying pan, flatten chicken breast so that it cooks evenly. Season with salt and pepper. In nonstick skillet sprayed with vegetable spray or on grill, cook over medium-high heat for 3 minutes or until no longer pink inside. Drain any excess liquid; dice chicken into 1-inch chunks. In serving bowl, combine wheatberry mixture, chicken and dressing; toss to coat well. Sprinkle with sesame seeds. (Can be covered and refrigerated for up to two days.) Makes 4 to 6 servings.

Caramelized Peaches with Sweet Wine Sabayon
(as seen on page 34 in All Stirred Up)

CHOCOLATE FIG CAKE WITH GIANDUJA GLAZE
(from Daphna Rabinovitch)

½ cup dried figs, coarsely chopped
½ cup Armagnac or cognac
4 oz. bittersweet chocolate, coarsely chopped
1¼ cups toasted hazelnuts, skins rubbed off
¼ cup vanilla wafer crumbs
½ cup unsalted butter, softened
⅔ cup granulated sugar
2 eggs
pinch salt

Glaze:
¾ cup whipping cream
4 oz. bittersweet chocolate, coarsely chopped
3 oz. Gianduja chocolate, coarsely chopped

In small saucepan over medium-high heat, combine figs and Armagnac; bring to boil. Remove from heat; let cool. In small bowl set over saucepan of hot (not boiling) water, melt chocolate. Remove from heat; let cool. Reserving 8 of the best hazelnuts, grind remaining hazelnuts in food processor with vanilla wafer crumbs to fine powder.

Using electric beaters, beat butter with sugar until light and fluffy. Beat in eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition (mixture may look a little separate). Fold in melted chocolate. Fold in hazelnuts, then figs. Scrape into greased and floured 8-in. cake pan; spread evenly. Bake in centre of 375 oven for about 30 minutes or until sides of cake are set but centre looks a little underdone. Let cool in pan on rack for 15 minutes. Turn out onto rack and let cool completely. (Cake can be wrapped in plastic wrap, overwrapped in foil and frozen for up to two weeks.)

For glaze, bring whipping cream to a boil; pour over bittersweet and Gianduja chocolate, whisking until melted and smooth. Pour half of the glaze over cake; refrigerate for 30 minutes. If necessary, rewarm remaining glaze over saucepan of hot water until pourable; pour over cake. Refrigerate for 20 to 30 minutes or until set. Garnish with reserved hazelnuts. (Cake can be refrigerated for up to 24 hours.) Makes 8 to 12 servings.

Thoughtful biography of 'one of the greatest scholars'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

To mark its 150th anniversary, the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York has published the biography of the rabbinical scholar and educator, Saul Lieberman who died 20 years ago.

The authors of Saul Lieberman: The Man and His Work, are former JTS students, Rabbi Elijah Schochet and Rabbi Solomon Spiro.

In the preface of the book, Ismar Schorsch, chancellor of the JTS of America notes that Schochet and Spiro "who both studied with Lieberman and over many years gained an impressive mastery of his legacy…put a human face on an austere scholar."

Schorsch notes that Lieberman's biography shows that the JTS provided Lieberman for over four decades with students, colleagues and "the compatibility and circumstances to revolutionize the field of rabbinics."

Harvard University expressed its high regard for Jewish scholarship by awarding an honorary doctorate to Lieberman. Lieberman also received honorary degrees from Dropsie University, Hebrew University and the JTS. Bar-Ilan University established a chair in the Palestinian Talmud in Lieberman's honor.

Rabbi Spiro, a lawyer who attended Osgoode Hall Law School in Toronto studied with Lieberman for six years. Lieberman awarded Spiro the Dr. Michael Higger prize in Talmud. Spiro is the author of The Moral Vision of Professor Lieberman: A Historiographic Approach to Normative Jewish Ethics in Conservative Judaism.

Rabbi Schochet, who was also ordained at the JTS, received a doctorate under Prof. Lieberman. He is professor of rabbinics at the University of Judaism at the Academy for Jewish Religion in California.

Along with a collection of anecdotes about Lieberman, the authors have researched unpublished correspondence, often of a personal nature, therefore, of interest to both scholars and laypersons.

In an interview, Spiro who lives in Toronto, said, "It is surprising that to date there has been no full scale biography of one of the greatest scholars."

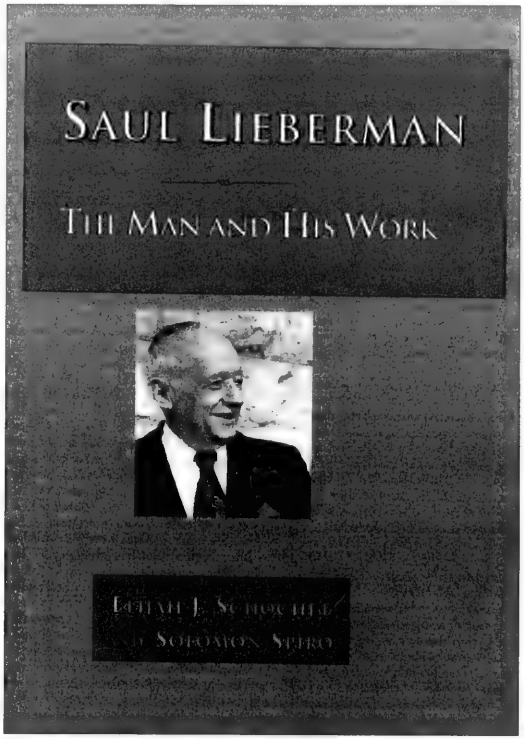
Lieberman was born in Lithuania where he attended a traditional yeshiva. He was introduced to modern scholarship in Palestine and flourished in America. His scholarship went far beyond rabbinics.

Lieberman published a work written in Yiddish, an essay on Chaim Grade entitled, An Eyduss (A Testimonial).

He could recite extensive selections of Russian and German poetry and prose. He could analyse the literary qualities differentiating Russian from British literature and he debated with Hebrew authors.

Three generations of students studied with Lieberman in Israel and America. Spiro says generations will continue studying his commentaries on rabbinic texts.

"It is our hope that this modest biography will encourage readers to seek out his works and will, at the very least, enhance the degree of recognition of his remarkable contribution to Jewish scholarship,"



Saul Lieberman: The Man and His Work

Spiro says the motivation for writing this book was to encourage students, scholars and all those interested in learning more about Judaism, to turn to Lieberman's monumental works.

"This is not only a book to lead us to Lieberman. It offers a portrayal of one who exemplifies the highest standard of ethical behavior. In Judaism, we look to great men who stand for the highest ethical values of our faith. That describes Professor Lieberman."

He says the project for him and Schochet, "was truly a labour of love, rekindling our appreciation of our gratitude for the privilege of having studied at our master's feet more than 40 years ago. The passage of time notwithstanding, we shall always remain his students."

Netanyahu launches campaign in West Bank

By JONATHAN LIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A day after he announced that his candidacy for the Likud leadership and prime minister, Knesset member Benjamin Netanyahu continued his election campaign with a tour of the area dubbed E-1, which connects Jerusalem and Ma'aleh Adumim.

Netanyahu said on the tour that he supported building up the area to create contiguity between Jerusalem and Ma'aleh Adumim and blasted Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for failing to do so.

"Sharon has created a precedent that could lead to dividing Jerusalem," he said.

The cabinet yesterday approved the building of a police station in E-1 close to Ma'aleh Adumim.

Former minister Natan Sharansky, Knesset speaker Reuven Rivlin and MKs Michael Gorlovsky, Ayoub Kara and Michael Ratzon accompanied Netanyahu, who also met Ma'aleh Adumim Mayor Benny Kashriel.

"Jerusalem is in danger and Sharon has increased it. He set a principle of uprooting Jews to the 1967 lines from Gush Katif. The second threat he has created is by delaying the construction between Ma'aleh Adumim and Jerusalem," Netanyahu said.

"Sharon is not preventing the Palestinians from taking over Jerusalem's eastern part and is isolating Jerusalem from Ma'aleh Adumim. The Palestinians want to create settlement contiguity from north to south and we want contiguity from east to west. To stop them, we must overcome them," he said.

The E-1 plan is designed to create a settlement contiguity of some 3,500 housing units between Jerusalem and Ma'aleh Adumim. Sharon has refrained from promoting the construction plans in the region to avoid confrontation with the American administration, which objects to building in the area.

However, Ha'aretz reported last week that Sharon acted to facilitate building the police's regional headquarters in the area.

Officials from Jerusalem's municipal planning department said recently that building another Jewish neighborhood, "Sha'ar Mizrah," in Jerusalem's municipal area, to link the city to E-1, would not be possible due to the private Palestinian ownership of numerous plots of land in the area.

This would require prolonged legal battles and lead to harsh world criticism, they said.

Peace Now secretary general Yariv Oppenheimer commented: "Netanyahu wants to sabotage the most sensitive spot in Israeli-American relations. Building in E-1 means a fatal blow to the idea of two states for two nations and would break the contiguity between the north and south West Bank."

Jordan's King Abdullah to visit Israel publicly for first time

By ALUF BENN AND YOAV STERN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Jordan's King Abdullah was to visit Israel this week and meet with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to discuss the aftermath of the disengagement, Israeli officials said.

Although Abdullah has previously visited Sharon in secret at his Sycamore Ranch, this will be the king's first public visit to Israel.

The Israeli officials said the meeting was co-ordinated by the head of the Mossad, Meir Dagan, but officials in Jordan were denying reports of the planned visit to Israel. Jordan regularly denies such reports until a fixed date is set for a visit.

Sharon and Abdullah met in February at the Sharm el-Sheikh summit in Egypt, and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz met with the Jordanian king last month in the Jordanian port city of Aqaba.

Political sources in Jerusalem said the visit was part of the ongoing support that regional and world leaders are showing toward Sharon in the wake of the evacuation of the Gaza Strip and part of the northern West Bank. Amman also wishes to strengthen its role with the Palestinians in the peace process, fearing an escalation in the West Bank that could spill into Jordan.

WITH LOTS OF LOVE: It was standing room only in the 800-seat Petach Tikvah cultural centre for a musical presentation of With Lots of Love, given by 30 children who attend the Ezer Mizion children's division programs in Israel. Children with a variety of special needs became stars as they sang and danced to the enthusiastic applause of the audience. Elaborate costumes and stage design, and state-of-the-art lighting were the order of the day. Hundreds of children benefit from Ezer Mizion's physical, occupational and speech therapy programs in centres across country. Many also enjoy Ezer Mizion regional summer camps. [Israel photo]

About 10,000 New Orleans Jews fled the city

However, more than 150 people were reported dead by mid-week, mostly in Mississippi, and the death toll was rising quickly.

Marni, a 24-year-old Humber College student, was due to arrive home last Monday after a one-week vacation in New Orleans, but she and a friend from Israel were stranded by the hurricane. The pair were given refuge in the home of Rabbi Yossi Nemes, a Chabad shaliach in the New Orleans suburb of Metairie. The rabbi, his wife Chanie, their children and the visitors to whom they gave shelter totalled 13 people. After water flooded the main floor, rising two to three feet, the group stayed on the top floor for two days, but rain came in through the roof where an exhaust fan had been blown out by the storm, said Chanie's brother Rabbi Moshe Spalter of the Chabad Lubavitch Community Centre in Thornhill, and toxic water coursed through the home's taps, according to a Chabad spokesperson in the United States.

Rabbi Nemes was given a satellite phone for a brief call on Wednesday to let relatives know what was going on.

Marni's father had been particularly concerned on learning that a levee had overflowed not far from the house.

The group left the city on Wednesday in two vans, which the National Guard helped them get moving once water began to subside in their neighbourhood, said Rabbi Spalter. Heading toward Memphis, about a six-hour drive under normal conditions, they faced a three-hour wait for gas in Mississippi. As they were finally nearing the pump, Rabbi Spalter learned, the police shut down the gas station and told people to come back in the morning after a fight broke out when someone cut into the line. They spent the night in a shelter, and stopped in Jackson, Miss., so that Marni could fly home from there.

Lou Elmaleh told The CJN last week that his daughter had tried to get out of New Orleans when she learned of the impending storm, but flights and buses were cancelled, and there were no rental cars. She even tried hitchhiking. When she called Lubavitch at her father's suggestion, one rabbi told her he had a full car, but he referred her to Rabbi Nemes. By that time, the rain and wind had already started and it was deemed too risky to leave.

Torontonians Marilyn Rosen and her fiance Fred Shuster remained stranded in New Orleans last week when The CJN went to press. Rosen had called her mother, Bea Estrin-Freeman, from the Riverwalk on Thursday to let her know she was okay, although she didn't know when she was going to get out of the city. The situation was chaotic and people were scrambling to get on buses that were leaving, she said.

On Friday morning, Shuster's daughter Tammy told The CJN the couple had called the previous night and were without food and water. Crime was increasing in the Riverwalk vicinity, she said. The family has been in contact with Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs.

An estimated 10,000 to 12,000 Jews from New Orleans and its environs are believed to have fled the city. The city has a Jewish population of about 15,000.

Judith Finer-Freedman, a native of Tulsa, Okla., who now lives in Toronto, said her niece, a student at Tulane University in New Orleans, fled to Houston, and then home to Tulsa. About 400 Tulane students were evacuated to Jackson State University. Finer-Freedman's niece's classes were supposed to start last Monday, but were postponed. Finer-Freedman's mother in Tulsa, about 11 hours from New Orleans, was preparing last Wednesday to take canned goods and clothing to a centre that would distribute them to storm victims.

While many New Orleans Jews headed west to Houston – under normal circumstances a five- or six-hour drive – others ended up in Birmingham, Ala.; Nashville; Atlanta; Austin, Texas; some Florida cities and elsewhere.

Jewish organizations in the region and beyond have pitched in to help those touched by Katrina. Nearly 150 evacuees took shelter at the Reform movement's Henry S. Jacobs camp in Utica, Miss.

The Union for Reform Judaism also opened a disaster relief fund to help its congregations and the general community affected by the hurricane. The Canadian Council for Reform Judaism will be funnelling Canadian donations into it.

United Jewish Communities (UJC), the umbrella of North American Jewish federations, has also established a fund. In Canada, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has set up the UJA Katrina Disaster Relief Fund. Contributions will be directed to the UJC fund. Other Canadian communities are doing the same thing, said Maxyne Finkelstein, executive director of UIA Federations Canada. "It will be a cross-Canada effort," she said.

"We know this is an extremely compassionate and generous community," said UJA Federation spokesperson Howard English. Earlier this year, he noted, the foundation's tsunami relief fund raised $800,000 cash and $600,000 in supplies in a period of just over two weeks.

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon sent a letter to U.S. President George W. Bush on Thursday offering medical assistance.

As of last week, it was too early to assess damage to Jewish sites in areas hit by Katrina. Among sites of Jewish interest is New Orleans' Touro Synagogue, which bills itself as the oldest Jewish house of worship in America outside the original 13 colonies.

To help hurricane victims through the funds mentioned above, go to www.jewishtoronto.com (UJA Federation's website), or send a cheque to the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, 3845 Bathurst St., Suite 301, Toronto M3H 3N2 and write "Hurricane Relief" on the memo line. Further information is available at www.urj.org/relief.

Donations can also be made to Chabad at Disaster Relief Fund, 770 Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn, N.Y., 11213; at www.bnaibrith.org.; or through United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Canadian Region, 1000 Finch Ave. W., Suite 508, Toronto M3J 2V5. Cheques should be clearly marked "Hurricane Relief."

New Orleans shul now underwater

By CHARLOTTE HALLE
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

With both the synagogue he once led and the house he once lived in several metres underwater, Rabbi Victor Hoffman of Jerusalem is thinking this week of his former congregants in New Orleans in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, one of the most devastating storms ever to hit the United States.

Hoffman, who served as the rabbi of the Tikvat Shalom Conservative congregation in New Orleans from 1969 to 1981, has received dozens of e-mails from friends and former congregants filled with descriptions of homes devastated by flooding and looted and vandalized businesses and delayed weddings and headstone-settings.

"All the Jews I know were evacuated," Hoffman told Anglo File yesterday, shortly after New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin announced that between 50,000 and 100,000 people still had to be evacuated from the city. "The devastation is almost unimaginable."

Like 80 per cent of New Orleans, the affluent suburb of Metairie in Jefferson Parish – where Hoffman's former synagogue is located and many of the city's 11,000 Jews reside – is underwater, in some places to a depth of six metres. Hoffman reports that last Saturday evening, after Shabbat – with storm warnings looming – congregants abandoned packing their cars to evacuate the community's Torah scrolls and silver ornaments from the synagogue to a safe room in the Jewish Community Center in uptown New Orleans.

"I don't know if they are safe, but that part of the city was spared a little more than the suburb of Metairie, at least in terms of initial damage," he said.

Hoffman and his wife, Hinda, who maintain close contact with many friends and former congregants in New Orleans, are already planning a solidarity visit to the city's Jewish community, which itself cancelled a United Jewish Communities mission to Israel scheduled for next week. "We've pledged to come in January or February – not for parties or social enjoyment – but to express solidarity and to encourage them to rebuild and renew their lives – and to hug them," Hoffman said.

"I know of a wedding that was supposed to be held on Sunday night, which was moved to noon and rushed through at home instead of in the hotel; I know of another scheduled for this Sunday that was postponed until further notice.

"Life has been disrupted in every sense. The long-term implications of this are also enormous. My friends don't know what they will be coming back to – and we're talking about a well-to-do community with beautiful homes. I think many are going to find their livelihood gone. None of them know what they have left or what it will take to rebuild properties or lives."

Hoffman said that many of the city's Jews had left the city by car and were staying with relatives in nearby cities such as Houston, Memphis and Atlanta, where the local Jewish communities were pitching in to help. "They grabbed whatever they could take and left," said Hoffman. "I don't think they imagined quite how bad it would be. New Orleans has been spared from storms many times. They didn't leave imagining it would be weeks or months before they could return to their homes."

Help for Darfur refugees

The Israeli Forum for Humanitarian Aid, or IsraAid, in conjunction with the Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society, has launched an initiative to help Sudanese refugees living in the African country of Chad. The initiative seeks to help an estimated 200,000 refugees who fled to Chad to avoid government-sponsored violence in their home region of Darfur, Sudan. The initiative has received support from IsraAid coalition members B'nai B'rith, the American Jewish Committee and Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

Sharon son on trial

The trial of Ariel Sharon's son on corruption charges has begun. State prosecutors filed an indictment against Omri Sharon in Tel Aviv Magistrate's Court, charging him with fraud, false testimony and obstruction of justice in connection with his father's 1999 run for the Likud Party leadership. Omri Sharon has admitted to exceeding regulations on funding for the primary, and said it was solely his responsibility. Attorney General Menachem Mazuz decided not to prosecute the prime minister in the case. Omri Sharon faces a maximum jail term of seven years if convicted, but legal sources said the court probably would be asked to sentence him to around nine months behind bars.

Ties back on track

Israel and New Zealand formally restored ties that had been suspended over espionage allegations. Israel's new ambassador, Naftali Tamir, presented his credentials in Wellington last week after Jerusalem apologized in writing on behalf of two Israelis who were jailed for passport fraud in New Zealand last year. New Zealand had suspended most diplomatic relations after it accused the men of being Mossad agents, a charge Israel neither confirmed nor denied. "The incident is a closed chapter," Tamir said.

Security chief resigns

The head of Israel's National Security Council (NSC) has resigned. Israeli sources said Giora Eiland, a retired general, told Prime Minister Ariel Sharon he would step down at the end of the year. According to the sources, Eiland is frustrated by his inability to influence Israeli policy. The NSC was created in 1999 by then-Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu based on an American model and was expected to function as a government think-tank. But with most Israeli prime ministers preferring the counsel of confidants, the NSC has often been sidelined in major decision-making.

Israel to admit villagers

Most residents of a Gaza Strip village that has sheltered Arabs who helped Israeli security forces will be moved to Israel. Israeli defence ministry officials said 200 of Dahaniya's 300 inhabitants will receive government compensation and be moved en masse to Tel Arad in southern Israel. Those eligible for relocation are Palestinians or Bedouins who either have Israeli citizenship or are undergoing naturalization. Of the remainder, some have already moved to Israel to live with residents, while the rest are expected to be absorbed by the Palestinian Authority. Many Palestinians consider Dahaniya traitorous as it has taken in both Palestinian informers and Bedouin Arabs who helped Israeli forces in the Sinai before it was handed back to Egypt under a 1979 peace accord.

Hamas promises 'hell'

A top Hamas terrorist came out of hiding to gloat at Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. "Now you have left Gaza humiliated," Mohammed Deif, a bomb maker for the Islamic terrorist group who went underground after surviving an Israeli airstrike two years ago said in a videotaped message, "now the Israelis have all gone to hell," said Deif, his face hidden. He vowed that "all of Palestine" – referring to the West Bank and Israel – would now "become hell," hinting that Hamas planned to resume terrorist attacks.

S. Africa educators learn new way to teach about the Holocaust

By MOIRA SCHNEIDER
JTA

CAPE TOWN — Educators in a country that confronted its own racist past have recently learned new ways to teach about Nazi racism in the nation's schools.

A four-day seminar for educators Aug. 1 to 4 was organized by the Cape Town Holocaust Centre, in consultation with South Africa's national department of education.

Facilitated by Stephen Feinberg, the national outreach director for the education division of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, "Understanding Social Darwinism, Race, Eugenics and Human Rights" attracted more than 60 curriculum advisers, administrators, education managers and teachers.

The subject forms part of the new Grade 11 history curriculum, which examines how social Darwinism, race and eugenics motivated Nazi ideology and also partially influenced apartheid ideology.

The moral and ethical issues that arose out of the Holocaust are also being taught as part of a school curriculum for students in grades 10, 11 and 12.

Feinberg conducts educational programs throughout the United States, and through his association with the Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research, he has worked in several European countries. It is not necessarily nations with troubled pasts that avail themselves of his services, he says, but rather countries that are "interested in learning about the Holocaust and how to teach it."

Feinberg praises the work being done at the South African centre and the quality of the local seminar participants, who came from seven of the country's nine provinces.

"I think that the teachers here in South Africa are extraordinary," he says. "They are asking questions and raising issues about this history within the context of South Africa's past in a very constructive, positive way. I think their experience under apartheid has made them more understanding of the similarities and, more importantly, the differences between the history of apartheid and the history of the Holocaust."

Holocaust education has until now, at least in the United States, been viewed as "pure history," he says, with little emphasis on extracting ethical lessons and acting on them. "I think that in the 21st century, a lot more emphasis is being placed on helping people develop moral compasses.

"After all, of the 14 people who attended the Wannsee Conference to implement the Final Solution [in 1942], seven of them had Ph.Ds. Therefore, you ask yourself a question: Is education enough? Is there something more than education in educating about the Holocaust?"

Pam Bernardo, a history teacher at the Ned Doman High School in the Cape Town suburb of Athlone, which was once a town for mixed-race South Africans, says she learned a different way of approaching the Holocaust in the classroom through her participation in the seminar.

"We all know about Adolf Hitler and Nazi atrocities, but what bothered me is how neighbours could be blinded or choose to be blinded, could allow the kind of evil that occurred. Ordinary people were neighbours to Jews, and ordinary people turned away and allowed these things to happen. I was more horrified by just how you and I could do that.

The centre, which opened in 1999, offers programs for high school students, teachers, university and college students, members of the civil service, the military academy and navy, corporations, prisons and a wide variety of other groups in South Africa.

Israeli, Pakistani officials hold meeting

Turkey, Jordan, Egypt and Mauritania.

"I think there was a major breakthrough today in the relations between us and Pakistan," Shalom told Israel Radio. "Of course, we ultimately want diplomatic relations, but we decided that from now on, the relations will be open, the relations will be good," he said.

"Pakistan, as the second largest Muslim country after Indonesia, undoubtedly has value of great importance, has central value."

Shalom praised Musharraf, for initiating the meeting, and said the Pakistanis had informed the Palestinians that it would take place. Shalom also said ties with Pakistan, which has long taken a hard line against Israel, have no bearing on the good relations Israel has with India.

The meeting was expected to be followed by confidence-building measures, such as a relaxation of Pakistan's ban against travel to Israel, an Israeli official said. Shalom said he and Kasuri had decided to take several diplomatic steps that are still in the initial stages. He refused to elaborate, but suggested that the countries may begin by sending ministerial delegations.

"There is no conflict whatsoever between Israel and Pakistan and no logical reason why the two countries could not have a constructive and positive bilateral relationship," Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Regev said in Jerusalem.

Shalom and Kasuri informally met Wednesday night at a dinner in Istanbul, Israeli officials said.

The meeting was held at the Four Seasons Hotel, a former Ottoman prison, not far from Topkapi Palace. Security was extremely tight with Turkish and Israeli security officials searching bags and even disassembling photographers' cameras.

'Relations will be open'

Zalman Shoval, a former Israeli ambassador to Washington and a foreign policy adviser to Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, said Israel would welcome relations with Islamabad, and has been quietly working toward that goal.

"There have been contacts on different levels with Pakistani officials for several years," Shoval told Associated Press. "Even I myself had contacts with the Pakistani ambassador during my tenure in Washington and I always heard the willingness and desire to establish relations at the right moment," he said.

"Israel is of course interested in widening its official diplomatic relations with as many countries as possible and especially Muslim countries."

In Islamabad, the Dawn newspaper said Shalom and Kasuri were meeting "in response to Israel's keenness to establish contact with Pakistan."

Musharraf, a key U.S. ally on the Indian subcontinent, has been gradually moving toward conciliation with Israel, despite the influence of a powerful Islamic radical party in Pakistan.

The Pakistani president accepted an invitation to address an interfaith conference this month organized by the Council for World Jewry while he is in New York to attend the UN General Assembly.

The Arabic-language television station Al-Jazeera quoted Musharraf as having called Sharon a "great soldier and courageous leader" after announcing his plan to have Israel withdraw from Gaza. Pakistan says Israel must abandon all other territory it captured in the 1967 Six Day War and clear the way for an independent Palestinian state.

Sporadic articles in the Pakistani press have appeared in recent years urging a reassessment of Pakistan's refusal to consider diplomatic relations with Israel.

Jewish student numbers up

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The number of students studying in Jewish schools around the world has grown substantially this year.

Jewish schools will begin their academic year next week in the northern hemisphere and, according to Jewish Agency details, half a million students will be studying in Jewish schools, a 10 per cent growth over last year.

This growth comes despite general trends of decrease in the number of Jews in the Diaspora.

Parents' desire to protect their children's Jewish identity and the high-quality education offered in Jewish schools are the main reasons for the increase of the Jewish student population in the United States. A major cause of the growth in Europe is anti-Semitism toward Jewish children in state schools.

About 450,000 students will study in Jewish schools in the U.S. and Canada this year. Half of them will study in day schools and half will study in Sunday schools.

More than 35,000 students will study in Jewish schools in Europe this year, of which 28,000 are in France, which is home to the largest Jewish community on the continent.

Jewish Agency chair Ze'ev Bielski said that 200 Israeli teachers will be working in Jewish education institutions abroad this year.

Palestinian school texts do not recognize Israel: report

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel is not recognized as a sovereign state in grades 5 and 10 school texts published by the Palestinian Authority, a new report says.

According to the Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace, Israel's name does not appear in the maps of these books.

And in some cases, Israel's name is replaced by Palestine.

As well, regions, sites and cities within Israel's pre-1967 borders are described as Palestinian.

The report adds that the strong historical attachment of Jews to Israel is virtually ignored, while all the ancient peoples of the Middle East are identified as Arabs.

Zionism is portrayed as a racist movement with strong ties to Western colonialism.

Israel's image is wholly negative, the report also says.

It is regarded an an occupying power that oppresses Palestinians, and it is blamed for the Palestinian refugee problem.

Jerusalem, Israel's capital, is depicted as exclusively Arab.

Nothing is said about the historical, religious and cultural connections of Jews to the city.

Peace with Israel is never mentioned in the texts, let alone encouraged.

Nevertheless, improvements have occurred in the texts under examination, the report claims.

There is grudging acknowledgement that Palestine has a "connection to the Jewish religion and ancient historical memories."

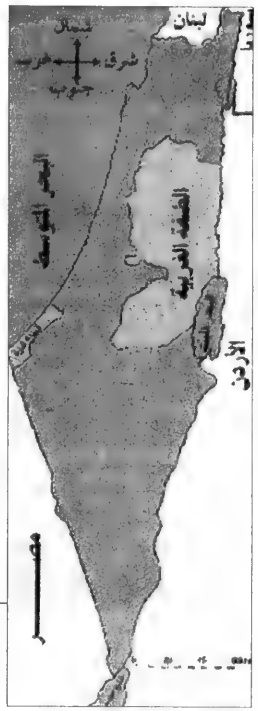
A fallen enemy soldier, presumably an Israeli, is presented as a human being with a family of his own.

However, the infamous Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a czarist anti-Semitic fabrication, is treated as a historical document.

The Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace, which was established in 1998, is a non-governmental, non-profit organization based in New York state.

Its mission is to determine whether Palestinian and Israeli children are being taught to accept and recognize the right of the other to exist.

This is the fifth report it has issued on Palestinian school texts.



In this map of historic Palestine, which appears in a Grade 5 Palestinian school text, Israel's name goes unmentioned, but the West Bank and the Gaza Strip are named.

The truth about Jewish husbands and dads

By LEONARD FELDER
Special to The CJN

My wife Linda and I met a non-Jewish woman who said she wants to marry a Jewish man because "I've always heard they make the best husbands and dads." Is she right, or is this just a stereotype?

As a Jewish psychologist who has been counselling couples for more than 23 years, I wanted to find the truth about the myth of the "menschy" Jewish husband. So for the past few years I've been collecting data from surveying over 2,700 couples.

Here's what I found:

Some good news: Almost 34 per cent of Jewish husbands and fathers seem to qualify as menschen. Just over one-third of the Jewish men I was able to assess in these surveys fit the criteria for being great husbands and fathers. Somehow these individuals are able to work hard at their jobs and still find time and energy to be involved in household chores, child care, shared spousal teamwork and family activities. These multi-tasking and compassionate men deserve our heartfelt thanks – because their kids are growing up with great role models and their wives know the joy of having a true teammate in life.

Some sad news: Almost 29 per cent of Jewish husbands and fathers have serious problems because they are emotionally unavailable to their loved ones. Despite the stereotype that says Jewish men are the "chosen" husbands, in fact there are a sizable number of Jewish husbands and fathers (some with high incomes and some with moderate or low incomes) who don't seem able or willing to be good listeners or helpful partners at home for their wives. Nor do they tend to pitch in much with child-care or family activities. In some cases, the problem is due to frequent business travel, after which his wife and kids say, "When he's finally at home, he's either cranky and short-tempered or he's obsessed with golf or video games or watching his favourite shows on television while tuning out the rest of us." Or he's described as "a bit self-absorbed, and even though he does some good volunteer events for the community, he's always got an excuse for not doing his fair share when it comes to the kids or the chores. It's almost as if the kids are being raised by a single mom."

Some mixed news: Approximately 37 per cent of Jewish husbands and fathers fluctuate between being a caring family member and being unavailable because of other priorities. This is the group that fascinates me most as a psychologist. I discovered that over one-third of Jewish marriages have occasional tension because there is a husband/dad who deeply desires to have a peaceful and involved family life, but he's often pulled away by stressful work demands, sporting events, volunteer commitments or hobbies that eat up most of his free time. These are men who do want to get an "A" at being great husbands and fathers, but most of them didn't grow up with very good modelling from their own dads. So they are right on the edge between being appreciated sometimes by their wife and kids and being resented at other times for how they fail to follow through on their family commitments.

Some possible remedies: If you are a Jewish husband and dad (or if you know one) who needs a minor tune-up or a major overhaul, there are specific things that can improve the situation. As I describe in my new book Wake Up or Break Up: The 8 Crucial Steps to Strengthening Your Relationship (Rodale), the first place to start is early in the week when you carve out sacred family time (making sure nothing will disturb a beautiful Friday night family dinner, planning some enjoyable connecting family activities on the weekend, finding time for some great one-on-one conversations during the week, and volunteering to share the load of weekly tasks with your spouse rather than waiting for her to plead or get fed up).

In order to do this, it helps to carry a "kavanah (strong intention) note card" in your wallet that you pull out and reread just before entering your home each night. The note card that you write in your own words should say something like, "The precious souls I am about to listen to during the next few minutes and hours are more important than any customer, boss or colleague I've spoken to all day. They deserve my most compassionate and helpful self, not my impatience or my critical comments. Don't take these beloved individuals for granted, or they will pretty soon start pulling away or resenting the person they were hoping to love."

I've found in thousands of cases that when a man clarifies his intentions each night before walking in the door and doesn't show impatience with comments such as "Cut to the chase" or "Get to the point," an enormous number of arguments and misunderstandings between spouses can be prevented.

If a Jewish man is willing to take these and other steps to become the kind of husband and dad he promised he would be, then his wife and kids will truly feel like celebrating. Instead of a home filled with tension and arguing, there will be far more moments of true appreciation and mutual respect.

Walk for exercise, burn off calories

Walking is the simplest and easiest form of exercise imaginable. With its natural pleasures and range of benefits, walking occupies a special place in the world of healthy living.

Thirty minutes of walking each day can help maintain flexibility, increase mobility and build strength and endurance. Almost anyone can participate at any skill level, from seniors to kids. It's easy, convenient and inexpensive – all you need is a good pair of shoes.

Physiotherapist Yvonne Chan says that "the simple act of walking can play an important role in keeping you feeling good. Walking helps with mobility in your joints, stimulates muscles, pumps blood through your heart and lungs and can help you to lose… fat by burning off calories.

"It can be a walk around the neighborhood or as simple as finding a parking space farther away from the door. Start small and grow into it. It's easy to make walking a part of your everyday life. You just need to find your own fun way to do it."

The Canadian Physiotherapy Association suggests that before starting any walking or recreational program, you should ease into the activity to avoid undue stress to the muscles and joints. During the first week, walk 10 to 15 minutes at a slow pace on a flat surface, avoiding hills and stairs. After week 1, maintain the same distance, but pick up the pace. Over the next several weeks, build up gradually to a 20- to 30-minute walk three to four times per week, at a pace that is brisk but comfortable.

A warm-up and cool-down is vital to every walking program. Keep muscles flexible and relaxed, keep joints mobile and relieve tension and strain by doing a few gentle stretches before and after your walk. Important areas to stretch are the neck, shoulders, arms, lower back and spine, hip flexors, buttocks, quads, hamstrings, shins, calves and ankles. Stretch until you feel tension but not pain. Do not bounce as this can tear the muscle fibres.

The body was designed with balance in mind. If you walk out of balance, you are placing added stress on the parts of your body that have to compensate in order to keep you upright. With good posture, you will be be able to breathe easier and avoid back pain.

Focus on keeping your shoulders square and relaxed, and on achieving an efficient stride, not too long or too short. Find and maintain a consistent, comfortable pace. Maintain a tall, erect posture, keeping your torso upright. Keep your breathing relaxed and your shoulders loose. Think about arm swing – drive your arms backward, not just forward. Pay attention to your feet – actively push off, rolling your feet from the heels through to the end of the toes, and point your feet straight ahead.

Drink water or sports drink before, during and after your walk to ensure proper hydration.

Be careful to get the right shoe, and replace old ones.

Vary your walking routes from inclines to flat surfaces and sidewalk to grass to keep walking interesting and to avoid over-use injuries.

Don't use wrist or ankle weights while walking, as they put too much added stress on your joints.

Listen to your body, and watch for recurring or persisting pain. If you are concerned, get professional attention.

Chilling tale of suicide bomber screens at Film Festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The War Within, which will be screened at the Toronto International Film Festival on Sept. 13 and 15, is a searing portrait of a Muslim suicide bomber.

Joseph Castelo's feature, which is set mainly in and around Manhattan, is extremely topical.

Coming on the heels of the London bombings this past July, which were mainly masterminded and perpetrated by British citizens of Pakistani origin, it revolves around a devout Muslim who embraces toxic Islamic radicalism.

The film opens in dramatic fashion. Hassan, a brilliant engineer from Pakistan finishing his studies in Paris, is abducted in broad daylight in the Latin Quarter.

Shoved into a waiting car, and then drugged, he is flown to Karachi, where he is subjected to a brutal interrogation on suspicion of being a terrorist. Hassan proclaims his innocence, but to no avail.

Three years later, for reasons unknown, he is released. He turns up in the United States, primed to detonate a bomb in Grand Central Station.

It's unclear whether he was always a terrorist or whether he was radicalized by his arrest. But now, in America, he is ready to wreak havoc.

He takes up residence in his best friend's home near the target. Sayeed, a secularized family man and a doctor, is completely unaware of Hassan's terrible mission.

The crime Hassan and his cohorts is meticulously planning is foiled by the police. But Hassan, whose brother was killed in Afghanistan fighting the Americans, is hardly deterred.

He dreams of becoming a martyr for Allah in the fashion of a Palestinian suicide bomber.

In a subplot, Sayeed's unmarried sister takes a shine to him. But Hassan does not reciprocate, upset by the fact that she once dated a non-Muslim.

FBI agents arrest a suspected terrorist in The War Within.

Hassan, a mild-mannered person, betrays Sayeed's trust by trying to indoctrinate his young son and by building a bomb in his basement.

"This is God's work," says Hassan self-righteously.

In one telling scene, Castelo also explores the political currents in the Pakistani American community. One man praises the United States as a land of opportunity, while another denounces U.S. imperialism.

The War Within, which elicits competent performances from its primarily Asian cast and is ably directed, is chilling to the core.

Jeff Stanzler's psychological drama, Sorry, Haters, scheduled to be screened on Sept. 10, 12 and 16, deals indirectly with the emotional fallout of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States.

Ashade (Abdel Kechiche), a hard-working Arab taxi driver in Manhattan, picks up Phoebe (Robin Wright Penn), a frazzled television executive. As we gradually learn, she is is unhinged and demented. He is perfectly normal. The dysfunctional relationship they develop proves to be disastrous for Ashade.

The point Stanzler tries to make is not entirely clear.

Ethiopians' adjustment to Israel charted in Va, Vis Et Deviens

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Radu Mihalieanu's absorbing Va, Vis Et Deviens (Live and Become), which will be screened at the Toronto International Film Festival on Sept. 15 and 17, charts the immigrant experiences of Ethiopian Jews in Israel through the trials and tribulations of a Christian orphan.

It may seem strange that their story is seen through the eyes of an impressionable boy, whose desperate mother passes him off as a Jew so he can have a better life outside Ethiopia.

But the plot twist works, and Mihalieanu's film turns into something of a microcosm of the obstacles Ethiopians encounter as they adjust to Israel.

Featuring a cast of accomplished Israeli and Jewish Ethiopian actors, Va, Vis Et Deviens opens in 1984 in a desolate refugee camp in Sudan. Israel, assisted by the United States, has launched Operation Moses, which is designed to bring thousands of Ethiopian Jews to the Promised Land.

Amid the heat, dust and confusion of Africa, Hana, a Christian woman, rouses her nine-year-old son, Solomon (Moshe Agazi), from sleep.

"Go," she says. "Go. Don't cry. Go, live and become. And don't come back." But deep in his heart, he dreams of being reunited with her one day.

Renamed Shlomo after his arrival in Israel, the boy, who is determined to conceal his true origins so he will not be sent back, faces a myriad of challenges in Israel.

As he tries to learn Hebrew and fit in, some of his fellow students gang up on him. In despair, he concludes that he cannot melt into Israeli society.

Fortunately for Shlomo, a nice Jewish couple adopts him. Sephardi Jews of North African descent, with left-wing political and social views, Yoram (Roschdy Zem) and his wife, Yael (the luminous Yael Abecassis), are sweet and secular people. They do their best for Shlomo, an obviously intelligent lad who quickly learns French and becomes computer literate.

The film, which unfolds in Hebrew, Amharic, French and Arabic, clearly sets out the problems Ethopian Jews face in their new home.

Short Film Gaining Notice: Toronto writer-director Billie Mintz's recent independent short film The Fool, which stars Academy Award nominee Danny Aiello, tells the story of a person whose imaginary friend questions his existence.

The Fool is slated for screening at Toronto's Rebelfest this week, as well as in film festivals in Los Angeles and Kazakhstan later in September. The film was made with the support of the ARC (Artists Raising Consciousness) Institute, an organization that helps charitable groups further their mandate by using mythology and storytelling.

"I am very proud of what The Fool stands for and for what its intended use is," said Aiello, who was also the film's executive producer. "To have it be received the way it has been by the film community is just icing on the cake for us."

The Rebelfest screening occurs Sept. 11, 5:30 p.m. at the Innis Town Hall, Theatre 9, with Aiello in attendance. Mintz, meanwhile, is working on another short film for the ARC Institute about Myles McLellan, a survivor of childhood cancer. www.rebelfest.com

Names in the News : It's been a year since jazz saxophonist Michael Brecker felt a sharp pain in his back while performing in Japan. He initially thought it was just a severe backache, but it turned out to be myelodysplastic syndrome (MDS), a life-threatening cancer in which the bone marrow stops producing enough healthy blood cells.

Brecker's best hope for a cure lies in locating a suitable genetic match for a blood stem cell and bone marrow transplant. In his case, a match is most likely to come from someone who shares his eastern European Jewish ancestry.

While the Grammy Award-winning musician is undergoing chemotherapy, he's begun encouraging people to get tested as potential bone marrow donors. Through his efforts, marrow donor drives have been set up at various jazz festivals, including last week's Red Sea Jazz Festival in Israel.

"I remain hopeful in terms of my own personal plight and at the same time I would encourage everyone regardless of their background to go out and join the [bone marrow] registry," he said. His website is www.michaelbrecker.com

Film Festival Chatter: Among the 256 features and 79 shorts at this year's Toronto International Film Festival (Sept. 8 to 17) are a number of films of special Jewish interest:

- Actor Liev Schreiber wrote and directed Everything Is Illuminated, based on the novel by Jonathan Safran Foer. The film stars Elijah Wood as a young Jewish American who is searching for the woman who saved his grandfather in a Ukrainian town destroyed by the Nazis.
- Natalie Portman stars as an American living in Jerusalem in Israeli director Amos Gitai's Free Zone. She plays a character whose engagement has been broken and who goes with a taxi driver (Hanna Laszlo) to Jordan to pick up some money.
- A Christian Ethiopian boy masquerades as a Jewish orphan and moves in with a French family in Tel Aviv in Va, Vis Et Deviens by director Radu Mihaileanu.
- In The Passion of Joshua, the Hebrew, by director Pasquale Simeca, the title character becomes involved in a passion play in 16th-century Spain as both Jews and Muslims are being expelled from the country.
- In Fateless, director Lajos Koltai's screen adaptation of the novel by Imre Kertesz, the story focuses on a Hungarian Jewish boy who survives the Nazi concentration camps and tries to reconcile those experiences with his experiences afterwards.

Film is panoramic in scope

Much to her disgust, Yael withdraws Shlomo from school because some of the pupils' parents fear that he is carrying a communicable African disease.

And Yoram expresses rage over the insistence of the rabbinate in conducting ritual circumcisions of Ethiopian males. This scene unfolds against the noisy backdrop of Ethiopian Jews demanding equal rights.

The implicit racism that sometimes greets the newcomers is also revealed when Yoram's biological son rudely calls Shlomo a "kushi," an Israeli epithet reserved for dark-complexioned Jews.

Never having forgotten his mother, Shlomo asks an elderly Ethiopian rabbi to write letters to her in Amharic, a practice he continues as he grows into manhood. Shlomo, the teenager, is portrayed by Moshe Abede.

Shortly after his bar mitzvah, he strikes up a casual romance with Sarah (Roni Hadar), a lovely Ashkenazi girl whose father rejects him on the suspicion that he is really a Christian.

The passage of time is demarcated by major events. The 1991 Gulf War forces Israelis to don gas masks in case of an Iraqi chemical attack, while the 1993 Oslo peace accord prompts Israeli rallies in opposition to the occupation of the territories.

As might be expected, these scenes give Va, Vis Et Deviens a renewed and heightened edge, a documentary-like sense of realism.

Hardly pausing for breath as it heads toward its somewhat schmaltzy denouement, the film veers off into several directions.

Shlomo, played as an adult by Sirak Sabahat, cultivates his budding relationship with Sarah. And now, for the first time, he comes to terms with his new identity and feels Jewish.

Later, much to Yoram's chagrin, he goes off to Paris to study medicine. He returns as a full-fledged doctor. Shlomo's integration into Israel is signalled by a fleeting scene of the second Palestinian uprising in which, as a medic, he tends to a wounded Arab civilian.

Va, Vis Et Deviens, supposedly the first feature film on Israel's Ethiopian dimension, is panoramic in scope and real in terms of the issues it addresses.

Kenya's attractions include tropical beaches

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

NAIROBI — If you go to the Nairobi Hebrew Congregation in Nairobi, Kenya, a guard will probably ask for your passport.

The Orthodox synagogue, which maintains tight security, was built in 1954. The first 30 Jewish residents of Nairobi laid the cornerstone of the synagogue in 1914. There is no rabbi, with services led by congregants. There are 130 shul members, representing 300 people.

There are 500 Jews living in Kenya. Less than five per cent of the Jews living there are permanent residents; most are from other countries, including Israel. Kenya has five Jewish cemeteries.

The east African coastal country straddles the equator and shares borders with Tanzania, Uganda, Ethiopia, Sudan and Somalia. The geography is spectacular, from snow-capped Mount Kenya in the central highlands to tropical coastal beaches, lakes and craters upcountry along the Great Rift Valley.

The climate is tropical on the coast, the Indian Ocean is warm and the cool sea breezes are welcoming. The climate inland is equatorial, with night bringing cooler temperatures, especially in the highlands. The rainy season in Kenya stretches from April till the end of June.

Arguably the birthplace of the safari, Kenya tourism encompasses not only animal lovers wanting to check out the game, but those seeking adventure such as rock climbing and mountain biking. Cultural experiences include a sleepover in a Masai village.

Upscale resorts in Kenya offer luxury accommodation. As well, there is tented accommodation, along with cottages, manor homes and even treehouses.

Tour operators include such companies as African Quest and Safaris Ltd., which offer reasonably priced trips. More luxurious tours are offered by Africa Expeditions, specializing in mobile tented safaris; Ker & Downey, catering to the educational market; and Abercrombie and Kent (A&K), the pioneers of luxury safari travel for everyone, including honeymooners and families. Most tour operators can accommodate children of all ages on safari.

Typically a safari package begins in Nairobi after a day of recuperation from flying. Two Nairobi hotels are Nairobi Serena Hotel, a resort just 10 minutes from the city centre and the Norfolk Hotel, a historic landmark built in 1904. Nairobi's attractions include the National Museum, the downtown market and Nairobi National Park.

Closer to Wilson Airport, the domestic airport, from which a number of safari groups leave, is the town of Karen in the Ngong Hills. Karen is about 45 minutes from downtown Nairobi and within 20 minutes of the airport.

Karen is named for Karen Blixen, the pen name of Danish author Isak Dinesen, who along with her husband, Baron Blixen, bought the Swedo African Coffee Company and renamed it the Karen Coffee Company. Her struggle was documented in Out of Africa, a 1985 film starring Meryl Streep.

While in the area, you can visit the Karen Blixen Museum, the Giraffe Manor, the Daphne Sheldrick Elephant Orphanage and the Ngong Race Horse Track.

Places to stay in Karen include the Karen Blixen Coffee Garden Restaurant and Cottages, located in the Blixen Coffee Plantation's farm manager's former home, or the "treehouse" accommodations at the Ngong House.

The most popular place in Kenya is the Masai Mara National Reserve – one hour's flight south of Nairobi. It has the largest concentration of wildlife in the world.

Olonana is a Sanctuary Lodge property, owned by A&K, on the banks of the Mara River by the Olooloolo Escarpment. There are 12 tented rooms with great views of the hippos who call the Mara River home.

Activities at Olonana include drives to see the animals, walking safaris, bush meals and a visit to the neighbouring Masai tribal village, where you can see how the Masai live in their mud homes.

The 45,000-acre Lewa Wildlife Conservancy in Laikipia is run by Iain Craig. It is home to indigenous black rhino and Grevy's zebra. Money the conservancy receives from operating tourist facilities, including Lewa House, goes to environmental and community projects such as the building of schools.

Lamu Island is two hours away from Nairobi by plane. It is a great beach spot to unwind after a safari. To get to the hotel you must board a boat after deplaning, as there's only one car on the island. Activities at the Peponi Hotel on the island include a sunset cruise.

Tours to the old town of Lamu can be arranged. Typically, they last three hours, but two hours is long enough to endure the sights, sounds and smells there. With 3,000 donkeys providing transportation in the narrow streets, the smell is pretty ripe in the heat of the day.

Kenya Airways (www.kenyaairways.com) flies from London and Amsterdam. For more information, contact the Kenya Tourist Board at www.magicalkenya.com

Toronto actor all green about role in Power Rangers

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Matt Austin is a new force to be reckoned with in the entertainment business. He's an actor, playwright, screenwriter, director, musician and children's book author.

Austin is perhaps best known for his current role as the Green Power Ranger on Disney/ABC's popular kids show Power Rangers – Space Patrol Delta, seen by more than five million viewers every week.

The coming season is the 13th for Power Rangers, a show that changes its cast and theme every year. This year's theme is space cops. Austin is one of four Canadians in the cast of five main characters.

"I filmed in New Zealand from September until May. It was amazing going there. Up until then, I had only really travelled for work, as far as Vancouver and as close as North Bay," the Toronto resident says.

"The place was beautiful. I wish I had time to explore more, but we were shooting such a rigorous schedule – it was a lot of work," says Austin, who was able to fulfil a dream and travel to neighbouring Australia for a holiday while down under, and produce and direct a production of the George F. Walker play Problem Child.

Matt Austin: Seen by more than five million viewers each week.

Austin was born Matt Sadowski. "My first agent… told me that unless you have an ethnic appearance, ethnic and religious sounding names are a nail in the coffin of an acting career. So, I said OK to changing it, and while away at camp, I was trying to think of a new last name. Another camper's first name was Austin; he took a liking to me and gave it to me as a last name. It really caught on and people remembered it."

Austin started acting seven years ago in national and international commercials including for McDonald's, Pepsi and Oh Henry.

During the Oh Henry campaign, his visibility became much higher when additional ads of his face were posted on the side of buses. This eventually led to Austin's first series that aired in 2003 – he played a spy on the CBC children's series Spynet.

Prior to the series, Austin acted in his first short film, Shawn Postoff's Coming to Terms. The film was screened at more than 30 international film festivals, broadcast on CBC and garnered the actor Best Male Performance awards from the Yorkton Short Film Festival and the Manitoba Film Festival.

In 2004, Austin made his short film debut as a screenwriter, director and producer. His film Jimmy won an Awareness Award from the Seven Minute Film Festival in Canmore, Alta. He followed shortly thereafter with another short called Credit Role, in which he also performed. It was named Best Short Film at the Michigan Film Festival and the 2004 Austin Film Festival.

"I've produced, directed and filmed my own short films and now I'm trying to get a few of my TV and screenplay treatments sold or produced by other people," he says.

"I'm working on a feature film called Dirt that I've written and directed. We are shooting it in October. It is made up of an ensemble cast. I'm not acting in it because for my first feature experience, it is better to focus on the writing and direction of it as opposed to wearing every single hat."

Concurrently, he has had a successful career as a playwright, writing and producing a play called In Between with the Noble Players Company in Toronto. His second play, Someone, a one-man vehicle was featured in the New Ideas Festival with another actor. He plans to act in the role himself and take the show to New York.

Austin's third play, Two People in Complete Darkness, was a finalist for the 2004 Actor's Retreat. It's a play he wants to make into a film.

Immediate plans include acting in a short film in Collingwood called Gone Fishing with another up-and-coming actor, Drew Nelson. He's also teamed up with Aimee McLaughlin, a British illustrator, for a children's book he's penned, due out in the fall.

As for the future, "I would love to act in my own work that I have written for film. I would predominately want to be a film actor."

When not working, Austin enjoys playing music, going to clubs to hear jazz and catch unknown local trios or catching a play or movie. His website is www.matt-austin.com.

Israeli pianist Yitzhak Yedid brings his trio to Canada

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Israeli composer and pianist Yitzhak Yedid will be performing with his trio for one show only at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre's Al Green Theatre on Sept. 11 at 8 p.m.

The concert is presented by the JCC and the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation (CICF) in association with the Koffler Centre for the Arts and the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC), and is the second stop in a tour that includes Guelph, Ont., Winnipeg, New York, Washington and Baltimore.

Yedid, a native of Jerusalem, is a graduate of the jazz department at the city's Rubin Academy. He has performed solo in festivals in Israel, the United States and Europe.

His trio, comprised of Jewish and Arab Israeli musicians – with Ora Boasson on bass and Mikhail Maroun on oud – will perform his Oud-Bass-Piano Five Part Suite, a combination of traditional Middle Eastern music patterns and contemporary western music.

Yitzhak Yedid, centre, with Ora Boasson on bass and Mikhail Maroun on oud.

In a telephone interview from his home in Israel, Yedid, 33, said that when he was growing up, his synagogue choirs often performed Arabic and Jewish music, and the combination always fascinated him.

"I knew it was something that I wanted to pursue, but when I chose my musicians I did so for their musical talent, not because they are Arab Israelis."

His music, he said, is a synthesis of classical, jazz, "and a number of other styles, because performers today need to work in a number of genres; no one genre can be ignored."

His recent CD, he said, incorporates Middle Eastern traditional music with jazz.

They will perform at the Guelph Jazz Festival (Sept. 11 at 10:30 a.m.), and Winnipeg's Israeli music series (Sept 17, 8 p.m.).

Tickets for the Toronto performance can be obtained through CICF, 416-932-2260; BJCC, 416-636-1880; or in person at 4588 Bathurst St. or at Israel's Judaica, 870 Eglinton Ave. W.

Engaging, warts-and-all memoir of I.B. Singer

Master of Dreams: A Memoir of Isaac Bashevis Singer* by Dvorah Telushkin, HarperCollins, paperback.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Dvorah Telushkin was 21 in 1975 when she wrote a letter to her literary idol, the Yiddish writer and luminary Isaac Bashevis Singer.

In a modest proposal, Telushkin offered to drive Singer to and from a creative writing class at Bard College in exchange for permission to audit his course.

"Your heritage and love of Yiddishkeit is very dear and close to my heart," she added.

Surprisingly, perhaps, Singer accepted her out-of-the-blue offer. Phoning Telushkin, he said, "Halaw??? Can you take me to Bard College?"

At first, Telushkin thought the caller was her grandmother. But it was Singer. As he said, "This is Isaac Singeh."

And so began a 12-year relationship in which Telushkin, a happily married woman, served as Singer's secretary and confidante.

Throughout this period, she kept a detailed diary, and from it emerges an engaging, warts-and-all book, Master of Dreams: A Memoir of Isaac Bashevis Singer. Originally published in 1997, it has now been released in a paperback edition.

Telushkin ranges far and wide, giving a reader a balanced view of the man and his works.

Initially, she was put in charge of his correspondence – which was in a chaotic state – at $4 an hour. By 1977, she was taking dictation from him, transcribing his stories and essays.

"Isaac's power of concentration, exemplified by his ability to sit and dictate for hours, taught me immense discipline," she writes.

Singer was a perfectionist. After a magazine accepted one of his pieces, Singer would labour over the galleys. "Even now, if we see there is a chance for improvement, we must take this chance," he would say.

A relentless editor, Singer polished a story until it shined. As he told Telushkin, "A writer has a best friend vhich stands under his desk and this is his vastepaper basket. There should be not even vone extra comma."

Surprisingly, he was modest about his achievements. "Deborah, you should never praise your own merchandise," he advised.

According to Telushkin, Singer did some of his best writing in Miami Beach, where he and his wife, Alma, wintered. "Miami was Isaac's place to retreat to and immerse himself in his work," she observes.

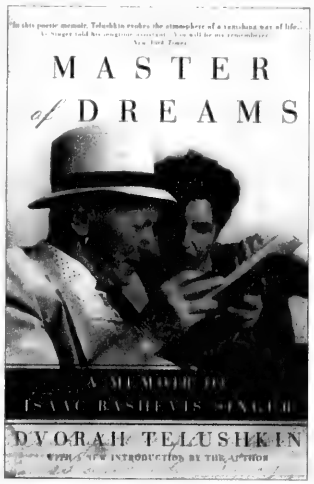
Singer was a popular figure on the lecture circuit. I recall covering his speech at the Jewish Community Centre in Toronto one frosty night.

By 1986, he commanded $6,000 per appearance. But often, he waived his fee if he felt a library or a book club could not afford to pay him.

Singer referred to his older brother and fellow writer, Israel Joshua, who died suddenly in 1944 at the height of his powers, as his "spiritual father."

As Singer put it, "For years he told me my stories vere no good. And this made me vork harder than ever. My brother repeated to me again and again, 'Bilder zugn: Tell pictures.'"

He believed his brother was immensely gifted. After winning the 1978 Nobel Prize in literature, he mused, "Let me tell you the bitter truth. Here I lie, the new big shot. But I don't feel things are completely right. It is my brother who should have gotten the prize. He vas a rare talent. Vone of the greatest… I know, if God Almighty had given him life, it vould be he now who would be getting the medals. And this would be right, dahlink, this vould be right."



Singer carried his fame lightly. He seldom read his reviews or watched himself on television. And he constantly wondered why journalists sought to interview him.

He left the impression that he had been paralyzed by writer's block in his formative years as a writer. But she disagrees with his critical self-assessment.

Some years before his death, an English professor found almost 2,000 of his untranslated Yiddish stories, essays and novellas, all written from 1924 to 1969.

Singer scoffed at the discovery, downplaying his journalism and dismissing his stories as "mere sketches." Telushkin thinks otherwise. "These pieces have a kind of raw charm, unembellished and intensive."

At 80, Singer remained active and feisty. He continued to write, lecture and meet his admirers.

One of them was Menachem Begin, the then-prime minister of Israel. Singer, however, did not endear himself to Begin, who was also born in Poland and whose mother tongue had been Yiddish.

Singer complained that Yiddish had been terribly neglected in Israel. Begin, a usually courtly person, pounded his fist on a glass coffee table.

"With Yiddish," Begin shouted, spittle flying from his lips, "we could have not created any navy; with Yiddish, we could have no army; with Yiddish, we could not defend ourselves with powerful jet planes; with Yiddish we would be nothing. We would be like animals!"

After Singer turned 81, he became reclusive and consumed by fear that another Holocaust was on the horizon.

Suspicion also clouded his mind: he cruelly told the devoted Telushkin he had lost all trust in her.

Long before paranoia got the better of him, he confessed he feared growing old and losing his communicative power. "I am afraid of senility. I am afraid of becoming blind."

By that juncture, Singer just wanted to die.

Toward the end of his life, Singer grew quite nasty, as she remembers.

When she and her husband visited him in Miami Beach, he shook a finger at her as his entire body shook.

"You are evil," he said. "You are a liar who has been born from liars."

During his prime, Singer was a disarming individual whose impish charm inspired immediate trust.

"Many people besides me eagerly confided their life stories to him. His heavy Yiddish accent and grandfatherly tone were more than endearing; they were bewitching. I felt I was being lured, almost lulled, into a different realm, another era."

Telushkin describes Singer, a strict vegetarian, as a basically kind person.

He gave all his students an A-grade on the grounds that anything less would discourage them. "Who am I, actually, to know if there is a hidden talent in someone?"

And when his editor at The New Yorker fell seriously ill, he sent several cheques, one in the amount of $1,200, to her hospital room. Years earlier, when she had open heart surgery, he gave her close to $60,000 to help cover her medical bills.

Yet, when Telushkin asked for a raise, he lashed out at her, showing an old-fashioned sexist side.

"You are beginning to behave like a man, not like a woman at all," he reprimanded her. "There is more charm to a voman who acts like a real female… In all these years, you have behaved the right way. You behaved just like a secretary. And this is how it should remain."

Clearly, Singer was a many-sided individual, and in Master of Dreams, she draws a nuanced portrait of him.

NOW, MORE THAN EVER!

Pressel almost makes history again

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — If it's unusual these days to read of Jewish athletes who dominate in pro sports, it's even more rare for one Jewish family to have two great athletes competing.

Yet that is the case for the Krickstein/Pressel clan, led by patriarch Dr. Herb Krickstein of Boca Raton Fla. In late June, Krickstein's granddaughter, 17-year-old golfer Morgan Pressel, missed by one stroke the opportunity of making history as the youngest player ever to have won the U.S. Open, as well as the first Jew to win this tournament since Amy Alcott in 1980. A 30-year bunker shot that tournament winner Birdie Kim drained was all that prevented Pressel from being the champion.

"I couldn't believe that actually happened," said a disappointed Pressel of her runner-up finish following the tournament. "However, I feel confident that I have a bright future in golf. I have shown that being young is not a setback in my sport."

For Krickstein, it was a case of deja vu. More than 20 years ago, his son Aaron, then 16, made history by becoming the youngest champion to win a pro tennis title – in Tel Aviv – in 1983. Krickstein was a world top 10 tennis player from 1983 to 1994 and ranked as high as sixth in 1990.

"This is an incredible feeling, to have two superstar athletes in two sports in one family at a young age. That has to be a first. I don't think it is possible that this has been done in sports before," beamed Herb Krickstein.

Pressel is starting to have a career in golf that may even exceed her Uncle Aaron's achievements in tennis.

However, it hasn't been all smooth sailing for Pressel.

In early July, she was less impressive at the Jamie Farr Classic in Toledo. She finished the four-round tournament two under par, tied for 23rd, eight strokes behind the winner, Heather Bowie. It was the lowest score by an amateur.

It's clear Pressel's performance at the U.S. Open was no fluke. Four years ago, then 12-year-old Pressel made world headlines by becoming the youngest player ever to qualify for a woman's golf championship at the 2001 U.S. Open. Her life has never been the same since.

The teen from Boca Raton, Fla., who broke 80 when she took up the game at age six, has been steadily getting better as she ventured onto golf courses, setting records and "youngest ever" marks at junior and amateur events.

Last December Pressel won her second consecutive class 1A Florida state championship by shooting a 62 in one round – a record she broke not just for girls, but for boys as well.

Leading up to the 2005 U.S. Open, Pressel won the Rolex Junior Golf Championship and the U.S. Open sectional qualifier in successive weeks in June.

"Morgan's talent is obvious for all to see. It is only a matter of time for her to start winning consistently," said LPGA superstar Annika Sorenstam.

Pressel's impressive credentials have given her exemptions in two more pro tournaments. Although Pressel could have competed at the Canadian Open in Halifax (July 11 to 17), she opted instead to compete in a junior tournament. The American Junior Golf Association (AJGA) ranks Pressel the number one girl in the United States.

Her instant fame can make a 17-year-old forget about other things in her life, such as her education, her family and being Jewish. But Pressel does not view herself as a star, thanks to her grandfather who is also her coach.

"Morgan is not treated differently than any of her siblings, brother Mitchell, 11, and sister Madison, 13. She has to do well in school and keep up with band practice," said Herb Krickstein, who coaches Morgan and relaxes her when she is playing.

"I love playing golf, but it is not the only thing in my life. When I was 13, I was studying hard for my bat mitzvah at Congregation B'Nai Torah in Boca Raton and was so proud to have read the prayers in front of my family and friends," said Pressel.

"I would like to be like my uncle Aaron, be as good an athlete as I can be and give of myself to others. [Aaron Krickstein won two tournaments in Israel and appeared in numerous fundraisers for Jewish community centres and other charities]. If not for my success in being accepted to go to pro tournaments this summer, I would have been in Israel myself in July as a member of the United States golf team at the Maccabiah Games. I hope...I go to Israel in the future," said Pressel.

> 'Two superstar athletes in two sports in one family'

Pressel has an impressive family legacy in both sports and Judaism. Pressel's great-grandfather was Conservative Rabbi Joseph Krickstein, who had a pulpit in Ann Arbor, Mich. Herb Krickstein excelled in baseball and was given a tryout by the Detroit Tigers, but turned down the offer of a major league baseball contract to become a pre-med student.

Pressel's father Mike was a hockey player and younger sister Madison is becoming an excellent golfer herself. When Pressel's mother Kathy, a former Big Ten tennis champion at the University of Michigan, underwent chemotherapy for breast cancer in 1994, she sent Morgan to her father's summer home in Grosse Pointe, Mich.

"Dad is a positive influence for Morgan. He relaxes her and never puts pressure on her to become a golfer to the exclusion of anything else," said Kathy Pressel in 2001. Thus, Krickstein was more than a token grandfather to young Pressel, but a zayde who has taken both a role as a loving grandparent as well as an instructor in golf.

Sadly, Kathy Pressel died in 2003 at age 43.

Her love guides Morgan and her family. "My mother always wanted the best from me. If I missed a shot, she would say 'Go hit the next one.' She was competitive and she set a good example for me," said Pressel.

Morgan had impressive support by her school mates at St. Andrews High School as well as by members of Congregation B'nai Torah. Rabbi Amy Rader, who officiated at Pressel's bat mitzvah as well at the funeral for her mother, feels that Morgan is an inspiration to others.

"I have known the family now for a long time. Morgan really sets an example that a young person can do a lot of things like golf and not put her Jewish life on hold. Morgan comes with her family each Friday evening for services. I have used Morgan as an example in my sermon of how a teen can make good decisions," added Rabbi Rader.

To that end, Pressel has decided to turn pro and make golf her career instead of accepting a golf scholarship at Duke University. Although the rules of women's pro golf do not generally let those under 18 compete, LPGA commissioner Ty Votaw can make an exemption. If he does, Pressel will take part in the LPGA's Qualifying School beginning in September.

"I know that I have grown far and that I can do well competing at any LPGA tournament, so it makes sense for me to turn pro," said Pressel.

Never too old for the Skyride something

By MIRIAM PORTER

I looked down at the little pink pigs playing in the mud and started laughing out loud. Seconds later, I was high above a big pond and I suddenly became nervous. Strange, I wasn't nervous 20 years ago when I rode the Skyride at the Centreville amusement park on Toronto's Centre Island.

But now my mind started racing. How safe is this little box-like cage? Could I possibly slip through the single safety bar and fall into the muddy pigpen or land on a goat grazing outside the barn of Far Enough Farm? Or even worse, land on a happy child on the pony ride, which has been part of the Centre Island experience for over 40 years.

I recently went to the island with a group of people and wandered off alone in search of a snack. I accidentally made a wrong turn and was suddenly surrounded by memories of my childhood. Everything rushed back at once – like an old fairy tale or a really great episode of Mr. Dressup.

My parents used to pack a picnic lunch and take my younger sister and me to the island for the day during our summer vacation. We looked forward to it every year, and on the ferryboat over, we discussed which rides to go on first.

But now, the stone water fountain looked much smaller than I remembered: I was once barely tall enough to drink from the silver spout and now it came up to my waist.

The antique cars that were first driven as part of the 1964 World's Fair in New York City looked exactly the same as they slowly made their way around the track. The red train was still running smoothly, and has now carried more than six million passengers over two bridges and through the tunnel on its route around Centreville. The bumblebee mini-cars still fly up and down, to their young riders' delight. The big white plastic swans with the built-in seats still float across the water. I always loved the swan ride. I watched them mechanically swim along. The swans had not aged one bit – only I had.

But I did not feel like being an adult that day.

I sheepishly found myself buying a single ticket for the Skyride. Running up the steps past the sign that read, "You must be this tall to ride," I remembered the utter disappointment of the kids who were not tall enough yet, and the exhilaration of the ones who were waiting all summer because they had grown during the school year.

I enthusiastically handed three young high school boys my ticket and they smiled while explaining the ride rules. But I remembered what to do – bend at the knees, hop up slightly, then sit back quickly. I was scooped up by the colourful bucket seat and off I went. The ride stretches across a large section of the island and then reverses back on another cable line so that you face the riders travelling in the opposite direction. I waved at two little girls whose faces expressed complete awe, and they gleefully waved back like old friends. One young boy gave me the thumbs up sign as our cable cars passed each other above a willow tree.

As a thirtysomething adult, I figured I would be the oldest passenger on the Skyride. But I rode past a woman in her 50s, travelling alone, clutching the rails, seeing the view of the island with wonder. Her smile was the biggest and brightest of all.

She looked free, and that was exactly how I felt that day. As adults, we spend so much of our time being responsible, but it's also important to run, skip, play, dance and remember the earlier days when life was simpler, when anyone could be our friend, and when rides at the island were an adventure into the world through the heart and mind of our youthful enthusiasm.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

One of the persistent questions asked by educators is whether education is about preparing people for the future or if it has value in itself.

The Latin root of education (educo) signifies drawing out or leading out, which refers to the notion that good teaching brings out the best the student already has within. This hints at an old idea in our tradition (and that of some others), which believes the fetus knows everything, forgets it at birth and spends a lifetime re-learning old knowledge. The metaphor is powerful, and whether or not it is related to any reality, could easily affect teaching styles.

This does not, however, answer the question posed above. Is teaching a preparation or an important time in itself? In most cases, instruction in a specific skill, such as learning modern conversational Hebrew, would be seen as preparing for some future use of the language. We know, however, that education is much more than mere skill instruction or even the transmission of bodies of knowledge.

Education is an all-encompassing activity that transfers data, affects both teacher and learner, deals with a variety of different intelligences and touches emotions as much as the cognitive process. Education at its best is a long, warm bath rather than a quick wash in the sink. Both get you clean, but the former feels better at the moment, gets you much cleaner and takes longer.

In our tradition, talmud Torah (one of our terms for education) is considered a mitzvah in its own right. It is understood that the act of study is a preparation for future life, but the same act also has merit as its own mitzvah. Not only that, but the rabbis point out that this particular mitzvah was worth as much as many others together, since it has the potential to lead us to those other important and sacred acts.

Perhaps the Hebrew word used for education, chinuch, best sums up the situation. It means dedication, an act that has its own meaningful ceremony of the moment, but which always refers to a structure that one hopes has a solid future built on strong foundations.

The greatness of youth

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Throughout my years in community work I have met many teens and young adults who have exhibited a mighty enthusiasm for and a tenacious commitment to tikkun olam (repairing the world).

I have witnessed the passion of a twentysomething Becky Vineberg, a Torontonian who recently travelled to rural Zimbabwe to work in a hospital riddled with HIV/AIDS, where patients died at an alarming daily rate. During her stay there, this youthful dynamo displayed an overflowing desire to help and a talent for alleviating some of the suffering of thousands of Shona people, working directly with men, women and children in need of her love and support. Becky is exquisite. She is gifted.

I have joined many high school students, both Jewish and non-Jewish, as they travelled the streets of Toronto helping and engaging the poor people we call homeless. With little preparation and prior knowledge of ways and means to reach out to this downtrodden population, our young people authentically communicate with them, exhibiting maturity and thoughtfulness, and consideration for their needs.

Youth has always meant a time when one can create, fix and advocate – and do so tirelessly with ingenuity and brashness. Nothing stands between the young and a fight for the release of political prisoners. This can look like naiveté, but in my mind, it is really a refreshing state of mind when young people just know that they can change the world. Their untarnished hope shines ever so brightly.

In early August, a 19-year-old living near Jane and Finch told me he will change the character of his neighbourhood and make it a serene place to live, I believe him.

A student studying at the University of Western Ontario in London showed me a proposal to stop the war in Sudan. These are not silly, childish imaginings. They are the real dreams of devoted youth. I believed her.

All people have their own individual gifts, but young people, given the chance, use their gifts in a particularly pure way, unencumbered by life's disappointments and roadblocks. Certainly there are young adults who focus on amassing wealth with little interest in repairing the world. I have met these individuals too, and ached at hearing their arguments about natural selection and survival of the strong when it came to the plight of the poor.

However, I believe that most of our youth can and will beam like the Northern Lights, working through sleepless nights with great integrity for the sake of justice and tzedek (righteousness). It is our job to cultivate and encourage these sweet spirits by mentoring them and granting them the resources to facilitate their objectives. It is our duty to show them that greatness lies within all personkind and when it is nurtured, we can alleviate much of the world's suffering and ensure that an environment exists where all people live in harmony.

If you are a teacher, identify your student's gift and introduce it to them. If you are a parent, show your children that the world is theirs and hungrily awaits their relentless energy and ingenuity.

Our greatest resource is the experience of age and the mighty vigour and inquisitiveness of youth. To wisely and consciously blend these two is to tap into the unstoppable drive of humanity and eradicate sickness, injustice, war and so much needless suffering.

Celebrate the gifts of our youth. When we do this, our young people mesmerize all of us. They will, without a doubt, astound and captivate us through their beauty and natural gifts.

Teaching is the best medicine.
Technology is revolutionizing the teaching of surgical skills and enhancing the success of surgeons across North America. The University of Toronto's Surgical Skills Centre at Mount Sinai offers medical students and experienced surgeons alike a laboratory setting where both basic and advanced procedures can be learned a practiced. Everything we do is for the best. Teaching is the best medicine because it instills values and skills in the next generations of clinicians and practitioners. And funding is the best medicine because it fuels everything we do.

Campaign 2006

For a World of Good

One of the most exciting things in the world is to open the doors to new possibilities – to create new opportunities. That's exactly what thousands of volunteers throughout our incredible community are doing, and that's what UJA Federation Campaign 2006 is all about.

Campaign 2006 is an ambitious initiative to raise 10 million additional dollars within three years to create new hope for Jewish young people at risk in our community, in Israel and around the world. They may be poor, abused, disabled, disadvantaged, new immigrants or alienated from their heritage, but it's now time to turn our attention to their needs.

UJA Federation Campaign 2006 is powered by three critical commitments on behalf of our children:

- Social Justice – assisting Toronto's poor and vulnerable
- Rebuilding Israeli lives
- Connecting Jewish youth to Jewish life

Campaign 2006 will shape the future of Jewish life, just as our extraordinary community volunteers are shaping the future of so many Jewish lives. Together, we can truly live generously, for a world of good.

Voluntarism is at the heart of what makes UJA Federation of Greater Toronto so successful. It is the foundation of our organization and the glue that binds our community together, making it one of the strongest worldwide. It is precisely because of all the time and energy selflessly donated by so many volunteers that we are able to touch so many people and change so many lives.

The following pages honour those who have gone beyond the expected, interceding on behalf of thousands who need a helping hand. Transcending age, gender or profession, these volunteers continue to personify the Jewish value of Tikun Olam, repairing the world.

Volunteers truly make a difference! They set an example for the rest of the community in how to live generously. Volunteers lead the way. We are indebted to each one of you for your commitment and devotion and we are thankful for your continued support.

Living generously ... through actions and accomplishments

Growing up, I was strongly influenced by the values of my youth movement and those who gave of themselves so that I could benefit from the experience. Like other Jewish youth movements, mine placed an emphasis on acts of Hesed. By age fifteen, I had been taught how to create memorable Jewish experiences, how to build our community and how to promote acts of Tikun Olam. Today, youth continue to be encouraged by various arms of the community to perform acts of Hesed and to "give Tzedakah."

Tzedakah comes from the Hebrew word Tzedek, justice. This week's Torah portion, Shoftim, emphasizes the absolute primacy of justice in Judaism. At the very beginning, the Children of Israel are instructed: "Justice, Justice shall you pursue." How appropriate it is that this week we recognize the exemplary work of so many volunteers in our community who tirelessly pursue justice. These people have demonstrated to us how to live generously. Through their actions and accomplishments, they have all taught, learned and done much to help make our community stronger and more vibrant.

Tamara Kochberg is Co-Director, Student Activities, Jewish Programme, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

Our community's youth are taught about acts of Hesed and Tzedakah in both the informal and formal realms. The more recent integration of community service and increased student activities into the school curriculum demonstrate a new emphasis placed on community awareness in formal education. While, at times, I am struck by the irony that today's high school students are required to volunteer as part of their yearly studies, to me there is no question that teaching our youth to involve themselves in community service and Tikun Olam is an essential part of their education.

This week's Torah portion reaffirms that a Jewish education includes the pursuit of knowledge balanced with the pursuit of social justice, meaning that "giving *Tzedakah" can be understood as giving of ourselves as well as giving money, clothes to the needy and food to the hungry. Further, we can best teach our youth this message by performing acts of Hesed ourselves, and serving as dugmaot (role models).

Together with our youth, we can learn from the examples set by these outstanding volunteers about participating in the community, about giving of oneself and about the pursuit of justice.

Learning to LIVE Generously – at any age

Going the extra mile

Our community's volunteer spirit starts young. Just ask nine-year-old Orly Morgan. Orly wanted to raise more money for UJA Federation's Walk with Israel, so she invited her friends to help in a unique fashion. She held a garage sale, all the proceeds would go towards the Walk and her friends would participate.

With the goal firmly established and the garage sale date set for their Pesach school break, the five excited girls searched through their belongings to find the right toys, books and nickknacks they could sell.

"I just thought it would be a fun way to raise money for Israel," Orly explains. "My friends really wanted to do it and it just seemed like volunteering on our holiday made sense."

"It just wasn't enough to ask our parents and family to give us all the money for the Walk," Sarit Cohen says. "We wanted to do something else that would let people know we really cared. It took time to organize the sale and work at it but it was worth it. We made money for the Walk and our project worked out. That was great."

Sarit Cohen

All the girls who took part in the garage sale, including Tohar Kochav-Lev, Sydney Wilson and Hailey Zacks, came out bright and early to participate in UJA Federation's Walk to show their support.

"It begins with something small like this," says Steven Cohen, Sarit's father. "Kids learn at an early age about giving of themselves for those who can't. I'm really proud of these girls for their conviction. I'm sure this is just the beginning."

Orly Morgan

The gift of giving back to the community

Fiana Kalp moved from Israel to Toronto with her family when she was 13 years old. It didn't take her long to find a community for herself at CHAT (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto) where her language was understood and her culture accepted. It was through CHAT that she was connected to the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) and where her desire to give back to the community was fulfilled.

"My brother went to Centre Camp at the BJCC, but it was too expensive for my family, so we received help," Fiana explains. "He had such a great time and I just wanted to give back to the BJCC, because they had given so much to us."

With a desire to volunteer, Fiana found an outlet. She helped organize and conduct the BJCC's large holiday events. For the last two years, she has worked on both the Chanukah and Purim celebrations putting together the parties and managing some of the attractions during the celebration itself. "I made a real connection at the BJCC. I felt accepted and my language understood. It was just easier. Volunteering there just seems right; the experience has been great."

Her experience volunteering at the BJCC has been so positive that she intends to continue her commitment to the community and keep volunteering as long as she can. "Volunteering appeals to me," Fiana says. "And I will continue to give back to the community in any way I can."

Coming of age through tzedakah

Matan Lustgarten

Adam Blankenstein

As young boys become b'nai mitzvah, they are said to leave their youth behind and take on the responsibilities of men in the community. For Matan Lustgarten, Adam Blankenstein and Sam Dekoven, this concept became a serious endeavour when they volunteered to help feed and clothe Toronto's homeless.

The idea came about when Adam's family decided to sponsor and work on a van that brings food and clothing to the homeless through Ve'ahavta, a Toronto-based global relief organization. Matan, approaching his own important day, decided to participate as well, and Sam, only twelve at the time, was very happy to join in.

"We were warned that the reaction of some of the people we would approach to help might be violent or aggressive," Matan explains. "But we never experienced any of that. Everybody we approached was happy to receive the things we brought."

The boys were out on the streets of Toronto well past midnight, handing out food packages and warm clothing to Toronto's down and out. The experience was humbling. "I never knew how many homeless there were," Sam says. "I used to think that volunteering was not as important as giving money, but I think it's even more important because, if no one volunteered, nothing would get done."

All three boys agreed that this experience is something they hope to repeat. "Hopefully I can do this again," Adam says. "The Jewish value of tzedakah is very important. We were glad we could make a difference in someone's life."

Volunteers fuel Toronto's GA

The General Assembly (GA) is not your average conference. It's the world's largest annual Jewish conference and it's coming to Toronto November 13-15. Four thousand participants from across Canada, the United States, Israel and throughout the world will be together to learn, engage and interact at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

It is no easy logistical feat to care for the needs of 4,000 delegates; it requires the support of over 600 volunteers, who will be serving the community on the front lines as ambassadors to meet guests, welcome them and enrich the experience for everyone. Volunteers will also be able to attend any GA sessions for free on the day they work at the event.

Confirmed speakers for this year's GA include Canadian Justice Minister, Irwin Cotler; Professor Heather Munroe-Blum, Principal and Vice-Chancellor of McGill University; Ben Stein, writer, actor, television personality and former speech writer for Richard Nixon; Deborah Lipstadt, who successfully defended a libel charge from Holocaust denier David Irving; Charles Bronfman, Co-founder of the birthright israel program; and Dennis Ross, Middle East diplomat.

The GA, hosted this year by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, is the premiere event of United Jewish Communities (UJC), representing 155 Jewish federations and 400 communities across North America.

If you are interested in participating in history, either as a volunteer or a delegate, now is the time to act. To register, visit www.GAtoronto.com or call the GA Hotline 416-849-1000.

"We promise you a GA experience where you will make new friends and be uplifted by outstanding speakers and programs. You will feel completely invigorated by being together with 4,000 Jewish leaders and volunteers from all corners of the Jewish world."

Israel ends the Gaza era

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

NEVEH DEKALIM, Gaza Strip — A blazing orange sun set over the Mediterranean as Israeli soldiers lowered their country's flag at the army's Gaza headquarters, signifying the end of an era on this sandy strip of contested land.

Last Sunday's brief ceremony, attended by top military officials and the parents of soldiers killed defending the area, marked the end of 38 years in the Gaza Strip, a period that saw the creation – and more recently the destruction – of Jewish settlements, and some of the bloodiest fighting between Israel and the Palestinians.

The three highest ranking army commanders overseeing Gaza – the army chief of staff, Lt.-Gen.

Please see related story on page 57

Dan Halutz; the head of the Southern Command, Maj.-Gen. Dan Harel; and the head of the Gaza Command, Brig.-Gen. Aviv Kochavi – faced an honour guard of soldiers and saluted them.

Together they sang Israel's national anthem, Hatikvah, and spoke of their hope for a better future.

"Thirty-eight years are coming to a close. The army is leaving the Gaza Strip," Kochavi said. "We leave with our heads held high. The gate that is closing after us is also a gate that is opening. We hope it will be a gate of peace and quiet, a gate of hope and goodwill."

Harel also voiced his hope for a future without bloodshed. "We are at the brink of something new. I hope the withdrawal of our troops signifies a period of peace and quiet with our neighbours," he said.

Queen to head Holocaust remembrance

LONDON — Queen Elizabeth II is to be the honorary chair of Britain's Holocaust Memorial Day Trust.

Holocaust survivors and faith leaders met last week in London's Imperial War Museum to launch the charity, which takes over responsibility from the Home Office for running the annual remembrance on Jan. 27, the day Auschwitz was liberated.

The Queen hosted Holocaust survivors earlier this year in a special reception at Buckingham Palace to mark the 60th anniversary of the death camp's liberation.

CANADA

CJC Appointments

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress has appointed new regional directors in Ontario and Quebec, as well as a new Ottawa-based government relations associate. Lawyer Steven Shulman, CJC's former associate national director of community relations, was named Ontario regional director and general counsel. Lawyer Joachim Normand, former chief of staff to ex-federal minister Martin Cauchon, is the new Quebec regional director, while Leyla Di Cori , formerly with Israel's economic mission to Canada, joins CJC's Ottawa office.

Rabbi With AIDS Dies

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — Rabbi Cynthia Culpeper, 43, believed to be the first pulpit rabbi to announce she had AIDS, died Aug. 26 after a 10-year illness. A convert from Catholicism, she was diagnosed in 1995 shortly before her first High Holy Days after being ordained by the Jewish Theological Seminary. At the time, she was the rabbi of Agudath Israel in Montgomery, Ala. She stayed on there until 1997, then moved to Birmingham to receive care at the AIDS research clinic at the University of Alabama at Birmingham, where she became a rabbi at large.

School Open 200 Years

COPENHAGEN — A Jewish day school in Copenhagen celebrated its bicentennial this month. Queen Margrethe II attended the Sept. 1 celebration at the Caroline School, which has an almost unbroken record of teaching since its start in 1805, closing only from October 1943 to August 1945 during the Nazi occupation.

Lawsuits Upheld

NEW YORK — A Brooklyn judge has upheld three lawsuits accusing the Jordan-based Arab Bank of helping Palestinian suicide bombers by funnelling money from Swiss bank accounts to their families. The Sept. 2 decision allows the lawsuits to move forward. The bank had claimed they should be thrown out because it did not intend to promote terror and because the connection was impossible to prove.

MI5 Spied on Jews

LONDON — Newly released documents reveal that Britain monitored some Jewish groups in the 1950s for fear their opposition to fascism could make them targets for Communist agitators. National Archives papers show the British intelligence agency MI5 tapped phone calls and observed public rallies of the Association of Jewish Ex-Servicemen and Women. The suspicions turned out to be unfounded. MI5 also watched another group, the Jewish Defence Committee, set up to combat anti-Semitism by the Board of Deputies, the representative body of British Jewry.

Comic Gets Off

PARIS — Charges against a French comic on trial for anti-Semitic remarks were dropped last week. Dieudonne M'Bala M'Bala was charged for comments he made in a sketch on a French TV show, in which he dressed up as a rabbi and denounced "the American-Zionist Axis" and made a Nazi-style salute and said "Isra-Heil!" A French appeals court ruled he was not attacking Jews as such, but rather a "small fraction of that community who profess extreme opinions and don't hesitate to turn to violent actions." In releasing him, however, the presiding judge told the comic, "Just because our court of justice is not sanctioning you does not make you right." The channel that aired the show in 2003 publicly apologized.

British Aliyah Wave?

LONDON — More U.K. Jews moved to Israel last month than in any other month since the start of the latest intifadah in 2000. More than 100 British Jews moved to Israel in August, most of them single, bringing the number for the year so far to 324, Ha'aretz reported. More than half are Orthodox, with 10 per cent calling themselves haredi. Ra'anana has overtaken Jerusalem as the most favoured place for U.K. immigrants to live.

Non-Jewish Students Visit Anne Frank House

TORONTO — Two non-Jewish teens – one from Toronto, the other from Orangeville, Ont. – were in Amsterdam last week on an educational trip to the Anne Frank House.

Kate Hazell, a Grade 10 student from Toronto's Humberside Collegiate, and Sarah Carter, in Grade 9 at Orangeville District Secondary School, won the trip last May as first prize in the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto's annual Holocaust Arts and Writing Contest.

The pair went on three days of tours, culminating in a visit to the Anne Frank House for a glimpse into the life of the girl who began writing her famous diary at age 13.

The annual writing contest for Ontario students deals with questions and issues related to the Holocaust. This year's winners used an essay and a work of art to answer the question, "What would Anne Frank tell us if she were alive today?"

Historic shul OK

JTA

NEW ORLEANS — A historic synagogue in New Orleans suffered internal damage due to Hurricane Katrina, but its exterior is unscathed.

Rabbi Andrew Busch of the Touro Synagogue told JTA that a local police officer with ties to congregants was able to verify the building's condition.

Synagogue leaders hope to return soon to the shul to safeguard Torahs and other items. Much of the staff is using temporary space in Congregation Beth Israel in Houston.

Founded in 1828 and located a few blocks from New Orleans' famous Garden District and fronting historic St. Charles Avenue, the Reform synagogue bills itself as the oldest Jewish house of worship in America outside the 13 original colonies.

Hurricane survivors are among the fortunate

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Fred Shuster and Marilyn Rosen are among the luckier survivors of Hurricane Katrina.

The Toronto couple, whose holiday to New Orleans with another couple turned into a harrowing ordeal, returned home Sept. 4.

"We were extremely fortunate," said Shuster, a 59-year-old real estate agent.

Toronto couple returns home

The foursome, along with a group that grew to about 75 tourists, spent most of the week immediately after the hurricane hit on an elevated, covered entrance walkway leading into the Riverwalk Marketplace, an indoor mall made up of converted warehouses.

They lived on food and water taken from the mall's food court. A police officer helped them get inside the mall for that reason, Shuster said.

The visitors were forced to leave their hotel and told to take only the essentials. Stressed and not thinking clearly, Shuster neglected to pack his arthritis medication. On his return to Toronto, he was being treated for swollen feet and legs, but he said that he was basically okay.

Shuster and Rosen and their friends were directed from their hotel to the city's convention centre for shelter, but they were turned away at the door and told the facility was being set up for the homeless, said Shuster.

"Everybody said, 'You have to fend for yourselves.'"

The group they joined at the Riverwalk – including Australians, New Zealanders, Americans and Britons – bonded well and helped each other out, but "a lot of it was extremely frightening," said Shuster, who spoke of wind, filth, lack of sleep, and looters rushing past them to get into the mall.

At one point they thought an unruly mob was going to "storm" them, he said.

He tried to bridge the divides

From the editor's desk

My interview last month in Jerusalem with noted Israeli author Aharon Appelfeld was conducted in the fabled Anna Ticho House, a warm, charming restaurant and museum in downtown Jerusalem on Rehov Harav Kook.

The street acquires its name, not surprisingly, from the fact that the residence of Rabbi Abraham Isaac HaCohen Kook, Israel's first Ashkenazi chief rabbi, was also on that street. In fact, the Rav's house is literally next door to the restaurant.

After my interview with Appelfeld, I still tingled with the emotions he had evoked in me, feelings of connection to a larger history.

By no means did Appelfeld, in our discussion, ascribe religious significance to the Jews' return to the ancestral homeland. He avoided theological concepts in our talks. Rather, he spoke in terms of restoring and rebuilding individual lives as inherent to the rebuilding of the country. But the humility of his bearing, the hushed tone of his language and the understatement of his descriptions inescapably suggested sanctity and special significance in the very process of that rebuilding.

He was very much on my mind when I decided to visit Rav Kook's house, and perhaps that was why I did. In contrast to Appelfeld's reluctance to speak in theological terms, Rav Kook had always very openly proclaimed the theological significance of the Jewish return to Eretz Yisrael (the Land of Israel). Indeed, in the nation-building work of religious and secular Jew alike, he saw the heralding of a new age in Jewish and world history.

The rabbi's house is called Beit Harav. It has been renovated and refurbished to show exactly how and where he lived, and it is now an educational and cultural centre for all Jews. It contains an archive of the Rabbi Kook's manuscripts, letters and notes, a library, a permanent exhibition of his life and times, a synagogue and a garden.

He lived there for 12 years, from 1923 until his death.

Perhaps I was drawn to the Rav's house as well because the disengagement from Gaza, which had just begun, was being interpreted by many Israelis as a struggle between religious and secular Israelis over the national character of the Jewish state.

Rav Kook's son, Rabbi Zvi Yehuda Kook is considered the spiritual leader of the bloc of Jews who saw Israel's victory in the 1967 war and the recapturing of the territories as the signs of the imminent advent of messianic times. Rabbi Zvi Yehuda based his views on his own interpretations of his father's teachings. Not all scholars agree, however, that his father would have held the same view.

But we will never know how the father would have reacted to the events of the Six Day War because he died on the third day of the month of Elul in 1935. The 70th yahrzeit of Rav Kook's death fell last week.

One of his core teachings was communal unity, the love of one Jew for another. He believed that within the traditions of the Jewish faith were the instruments of life by which all Jews could lead meaningful lives.

Through personal example, in his prose, poetry and scholarly works, he tried to build bridges across the socio-religious gaps that so divided and still divide the people of Israel.

It is appropriate, merely days after Rav Kook's 70th yahrzeit, that we read a short excerpt of one his poems and reflect upon his lifelong yearning for his people, the unity that, alas, it has been the melancholy of our fate to lack.

Rav Kook wrote in Hebrew. His compact, alliterative style is not adequately replicated by translation. But the sense of the poem's meaning is.

One of his poem's, Shimu Elay Ami, rendered into English by Rabbi Morris Silverman as Hearken, O my people and found in the additional readings at the back of the Rabbinical Assembly of America's Sabbath and Festival Prayer Book, conveys the immeasurable profundity of Rav Kook's love for the Jewish people. It is a love, the reader will notice, that is broad, all inclusive and without differentiation. I reproduce the first few lines only.

"Hearken, O my people/ From the very depths of my soul/ I speak unto you.

"From the core of life where lies the tie/ That binds us one to the other,/ With devotion, deep and profound,/ I declare unto you "That you, each one of you,/ All of you, the whole of you,/ Your very souls, your generations/ Only you are the essence of my life.

"I live in you, in each of you, in all of you/ In your life, my life has deeper truer meaning/ Without you I am as naught.

"Hope, aspiration and life's intrinsic worth/ All this I find only when I am with you."

Gaza withdrawal exposes rift in Israel, rabbi says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The forced evacuation of some 8,500 Jewish settlers from the Gaza Strip has laid bare a serious rift in Israeli society, a prominent Orthodox rabbi warned last week.

The philosophic conflict between messianic religious and secular, pragmatic Jews over the wisdom of relinquishing Gaza is "tearing Israel to pieces," said Rabbi David Hartman, founder and director of the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem.

Settlers who were compelled to leave their homes in advance of Israel's imminent withdrawal are shocked, alienated and bitter.

As a result of these events, he suggested in an impassioned speech to a full house at Adath Israel Congregation, the gulf separating these groups has not only widened but is expected to grow stronger and deeper.

Rabbi Hartman, whose institute promotes religious pluralism and respect for "multiple approaches" to Jewish life, predicted that "ugly battles" lie ahead as Israelis thrash out the issues relating to the pullout.

The topics that will consume them, he elaborated, range from "Who are the Jews?" to "What is a Jewish state in the modern world?"

These conundrums are of greater importance than Israel's perennial dispute with the Palestinians, noted Rabbi Hartman, an American who made aliyah in 1971 and established his institute five years later.

Jewish settlers in the territories, animated by a biblical perspective on history, believe they walk in the footsteps of the prophets and are rebuilding Jewish memory, the rabbi observed. Rabbi Hartman said the settlers are not enemies of the state but lovers of the land.

But their vision of Israel is generally opposed by secular Israelis, who support the Gaza withdrawal and the uprooting of Jews there.

Although both sides are committed to Israel's well-being, they do not "hear" each other and dwell in different solitudes, he said.

His mission, he explained, is to "bridge the gap" between their respective outlooks so that they do not regard each other as enemies.

What unites Israeli Jews of all stripes today is the will to go on in history, but the rest remains open.

And so Israel is united by "a deep sense of solidarity," yet riven by divisiveness, Rabbi Hartman lamented.

In this situation, he added, not all Jews are friends and brethren.

In a historical review of the current troubles besetting Israel, Rabbi Hartman spoke about the origins of Zionism, which he described as "a revolt against Jewish tradition."

Secular Jews embraced Zionism out of the belief that redemption could not be achieved by waiting for the Messiah. Religious Jews rejected Zionism as heresy. Some religious Jews, however, joined the Zionist cause, thinking they could renew and revitalize Judaism.

Their descendants, the settlers from the nationalist religious camp, flocked to the territories after the 1967 Six Day War, building settlements with the encouragement of the Israeli government.

Having been forced out of Gaza and four isolated settlements in the West Bank, they now feel homeless, and regard Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon as a "monster" who betrayed their dreams.

But until the last moment, the rabbi said, they hoped that a "divine miracle" would stop the evacuation.

Sharon could have carried out the removals with greater sensitivity, said Rabbi Hartman, but he believes Sharon's intention was to secure a "better future" for Israel.

He does not think Sharon was influenced by demographic arguments, one of the main justifications for the withdrawal.

"We discovered that we couldn't live in the world without making a powerful gesture," he said in a reference to international pressure on Israel. "We can't survive totally alienated from the world."

He also said that Israel's relationship with the United States is of crucial importance to its survival.

Rabbi Hartman cast doubt on the proposition that Israel's pullout from Gaza will transform Palestinian attitudes toward Israel. In fact, Arabs believe it is a retreat that signifies weakness.

Most Israelis back a two-state solution, he said, but Israel's withdrawal may not presage a new beginning in its relations with the Palestinians.

Rabbi Hartman doubts whether the withdrawal will usher in a period of more Palestinian terrorism, yet the future is uncertain. Terrorism is a global phenomenon and Islamic fundamentalism is on the rise, he noted.

But Jews should not despair and should have faith in the future, the uncertainty notwithstanding, he declared.

Police chief vows to fight hate crime, prevent terror

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

One way to combat terrorism and hate-motivated crimes – such as the recent string of anti-Semitic attacks in Vaughan – is to maintain and improve the relationship between police and Toronto's different ethnic communities, Toronto Police Chief Bill Blair says.

"I can tell you that we have seen, post 9/11, a significant increase in hate crime incidents reported to police," said Blair, who spoke to about 50 invitees attending a "closed luncheon briefing" last week at First Canadian Place, which was organized by Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

"The increase has begun to abate, but we still see instances as we did the other day in the Thornhill area with the desecration of the synagogue," Blair added, referring to graffiti found recently at a Chabad branch at Bathurst Street and Elgin Mills Road.

Blair said his force is committed to creating relationships based on trust and mutual respect in order to be effective in fighting hate crimes.

He explained that with the number of minorities in the city increasing every year, it's more important than ever to train "professional policemen who have the values that are truly respectful of the diversity of our city."

He said he hopes to recruit more police officers from Toronto's many minority groups in order to help build a better relationship between the public and the police.

"Right now, more than 44 per cent of the people in the City of Toronto were born somewhere else [and] by the end of the decade, half of the city will be defined as minorities. This means we are going to see a greater diversity in this city and we are going to keep the city safe and we are going to serve the city well. We know we have to work very hard to make sure that we embrace that diversity," the chief said.

Blair also spoke about heightened anxiety around the safety of religious institutions.

While places of worship, especially synagogues, have increased security over the past few years, both the public and police must remain vigilant, Blair said.

Pandering and national shame

The British Sunday Times reported last weekend that a proposal will be submitted to Prime Minister Tony Blair that he eliminate the annual commemoration of Holocaust Memorial Day. In its place, his advisers suggest, the government should substitute the solemn commemoration of something called Genocide Day.

Holocaust Memorial Day, Blair's advisers point out, is an affront to some of Great Britain's Muslims. "The very name Holocaust Memorial Day sounds too exclusive to many young Muslims," one of the prime minister's advisers was quoted as saying. "It sends out the wrong signals: that the lives of one people are to be remembered more than others. It's a grievance that extremists are able to exploit."

The advice to the prime minister is contained in a set of recommendations prepared by four committees Blair appointed after the London bombings on July 7 in an effort to combat extremism. The recommendations are to be submitted to the British prime minister on Sept. 22.

Ironically, the proposals appeared in the press the same week that Queen Elizabeth II was named the honorary chair of the Holocaust Memorial Trust. Perhaps the release of the recommendations was an attempt to embarrass the Royal Family or persuade Her Majesty to reverse her decision.

Whatever the justification for the release of the committees' recommendations before Sept. 22, the purported justification for the proposal to do away with Holocaust Memorial Day is shameful. Where will the pandering stop?

If to recall the Holocaust causes offence, that is reason in and of itself for doing so. There is a grotesque moral and historical vacuum at the heart of any consciousness that protests the notion of recalling the Holocaust. The Holocaust is more than the chronicle of the destruction of European Jewry. It is the chronicle of the near destruction of western civilization. It is a chronicle of the worst failure of Christian European society.

Ha'aretz reported that the commemoration of "Genocide Day would include recognition of Muslim deaths in the West Bank and Gaza."

If these reports are true, then there is a more ominous peril hidden in the recommendations than merely witnessing an abjectly craven, self-defeating attempt at appeasement of the bullying thug. There lies, possibly, over the next terrorist horizon, the distorting and reauthoring of history itself by those who would seek a more convenient, more comfortable, more ideologically compatible interpretation of past events to accommodate and justify their present grievances – whether real or imagined.

If these are the recommendations forthcoming to Blair, we hope and pray he rejects them.

Yad Vashem is urging people to join our 11th Hour Campaign to recover names of Holocaust victims in the Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names ("Yad Vashem asks Jews to record survivors' names," CJN, Sept. 1).

In order to keep their memories alive, to reach the widest audience and to recover as many names as possible, Yad Vashem has launched a database of Shoah victims' names on the Internet. The database already contains some three million names, but this means we are still missing half the names of the Jews killed in the Holocaust.

Please search the database for names known to you, and if those names are not yet included in the database at www.yadvashem.org, add the names and information of that person. Pages of testimony may also be downloaded from the site or ordered from the Canadian Friends at Yad Vashem at 416-785-1333.

Rabbis disagree with colleagues

With regard to the letter written by a group of five rabbis protesting against the Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's government ("Rabbis accuse Sharon of human rights abuses," CJN, Sept. 8), we wish to state for the record that we completely disassociate ourselves from this letter. It does not speak on behalf of ourselves or on behalf of the entire Orthodox rabbinate of Toronto. We acknowledge that respected rabbis have the right to their opinion, and certainly the signatories of this letter have the right to express their protest in this way. However, this letter does not represent the official opinion of the Vaad Harabonim of Toronto.

Protesting rabbis' protest

Israel's enemies have been accusing Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of human rights violations for a good quarter of a century, not because they care about human rights and civil liberties, but because they want to further their political agenda. It's too bad that some Toronto rabbis felt the need to jump on the bandwagon ("Rabbis accuse Sharon of human rights abuses," CJN, Sept. 8).

I find it hard to believe the motivation behind their letter to Sharon was a genuine concern for human rights and not an opportunity for an ad hominem attack against him. How can rabbis who speak about a greater Israel without any regard for the Palestinian population, be taken seriously on issues of human rights?

Although Israel's track record on human rights in comparison to the rest of its neighbourhood is commendable, compared to the civil liberties we enjoy here, Israel has some catching up to do, especially when it comes to minorities. Only when civil rights abuses were allegedly taking place against Jews did these rabbis feel the need to criticize the government. Human rights are supposed to transcend race, religion, and ideology. Therefore, when people claim to care about human rights but only focus attention on the rights of one specific group, it calls into question their true motives.

Response to Mostyn

I am disappointed in Michael Mostyn's representation of the federal government's position on day care ("Mostyn on Dryden and the Liberals," Letter, CJN, Sept. 1).

Contrary to the Tory candidate's assertion, there is nothing in the agreement in principle between the governments of Canada and Ontario that denies support to Jewish day-care facilities or assistance to low income earners or shift workers. To the contrary, the agreement, which is on the government's website, specifically requires funding be used to enhance services that recognize children's cultural or linguistic needs, as well as making day care more accessible in terms of employment circumstances and fee subsidies. There is nothing in the agreement that stops the Ontario government from using these funds to support Jewish child care centres that have kosher food, have Jewish program content, operate on extended hours during the work week and have subsidies for parents in need.

As for Mostyn's criticism that the government policy does little for stay-at-home mothers, I can only hope that his adherence to discriminatory gender roles is not shared by others in his party seeking elected office.

Religious Zionism after disengagement

By RABBI SHLOMO RISKIN

The disengagement or "expulsion" has ended, but what remains are the pictures etched in the souls of a nation.

Grown men cried at the loss of their life's work and life's ideal, cries that often drowned out the more silent sobs of the women and children. The joint prayers of soldiers and settlers gave eternal voice to the silent embraces between them, clasps of leaving that offered glorious testimony to the oneness of our people, despite the apparent chasm that generally divides the evictors from the evictees.

Who can ever forget the father, a commander-general, who insisted that he be the one to remove his son, daughter-in-law and grandchildren from their home in Gush Katif. He met with them privately as a father first and as an agent of the Israel Defence Forces only secondly, and they emerged together weeping and embracing as a family. Ironically and strangely enough, we all emerged from a horrific experience as members of the family of Israel.

It was no secret that I vigorously opposed the disengagement, not because I believe it is forbidden to give up parts of the Land of Israel – I do believe that the sovereign State of Israel has the right to determine whichever borders it deems defensible and feasible for the good of the majority of its populace – it was because I believed that the timing was wrong, that it was unconscionable to give a prey to terrorism when the entire free world is threatened by terror, and because Prime Minister Ariel Sharon failed to offer a vision, a comprehensive program for a better future that might have given some justification for the suffering that was inflicted upon the heroic settlers of Gush Katif.

But is this also the end of religious Zionism? Are there lessons we can and must learn that may enable us to emerge from this most difficult period, not only having survived but perhaps even having been strengthened?

The evacuation of Gadid

The first lesson we learned is that we are indeed one nation, neither segment of which is desirous of severing itself from the other. Hence only a small number of soldiers refused to carry out military evacuation orders despite the charge to do so from some major rabbinic voices. There was no real violence and there was even majestic fortitude and an exaltation of spirit displayed by many of the Gush Katif settlers and leaders. The soldiers and police behaved with incredible sensitivity and restraint throughout their very difficult task. It was a heart-wrenching period; it was an uplifting period; it was a period in which I was both tear-filled and pride-filled to be an Israeli Jew.

Is this the end of religious Zionism? Only if the definition of religious Zionism is Greater Israel, and only if "we want the Messiah now" has become not merely a future wish but the description of our present historical reality. Let us remember that Maimonides developed a position of "normative messianism," teaching that "no one ought imagine that the normal course of events will be transformed during the messianic era or that there will be a change in the order of creation; the world will continue in its normal course...."

From this perspective, no one has the right to declare for example that God will never allow Gush Katif to be dismantled, as some important religious leaders did, or that if we all pray together at the Western Wall, our prayers must be answered. The only guarantees the Torah gives is that the Jewish people will never be completely destroyed and there will eventually be world peace emanating from Jerusalem. As far as everything else is concerned, pray and work to achieve the best, but prepare for and be ready to accept the worst. At the same time that the Talmud teaches that "even when a sword dangles at your throat, you must not despair of divine mercy," nevertheless our sages also declare, "It is forbidden to rely on miracles."

And a major part of working to achieve the best is by living a life of dialogue and engagement with our secular brothers and sisters. Religious Zionism from the time of the early years of Israel until the immediate aftermath of the Yom Kippur War was based on compromise regarding land, on our acceptance of a partition plan and our withdrawal from Sinai in 1956 and on our modest belief in our era as merely "the beginning of the sprouting of our redemption," as a lengthy process fraught with advances and regressions, achievements and setbacks. It was this attitude of compromise that prevented us from a no-exit collision course with Palestinian fundamentalists screaming, "Not one grain of sand," and our nationalists insisting, "Not one inch."

And it is this spirit of compromise that fostered our constant presence in the government, even at times in rabidly secular governments, as an expression of our willingness to continue our dialogue with those with whom we may violently disagree about many issues of the State of Israel, but we realize that the common Judaism and Israelism that unites us is stronger than any ritual observances that may divide us. And it is only such a spirit of compromise regarding the religion of Israel that will enable us to live together in a democratic state (even when a prime minister pushes democracy to its limits), and prevents our self-destruction in a fire of internal enmity, such as the one that destroyed the Second Commonwealth even before the Romans touched the Holy Temple!

The removal of the Sifrei Torah from Gadid [Isranet photos]

It was after the Yom Kippur War – a miraculous although agonizingly belated victory after the IDF had been caught with its "pants down" – that car stickers with "Israel has confidence in God" began appearing (in contrast to the car stickers of "all glory to the IDF" after the Six Day War). At that point a significant portion, most of national-religious Israel, began to feel that the messianic age had arrived, that Greater Israel was an unstoppable phenomenon and that we must place on the top of our agendas settlement building throughout Judea, Samaria and Gaza. It was as though the Almighty entered into a covenant with our generation: we were to build the settlements and God would guarantee their permanence.

And we built glorious settlements, model communities based on idealistic love of land and spiritual and intellectual love of Torah. But in the process, we left the rest of the nation behind. Most of our settlements had screening committees that set up conditions for acceptance – mainly religious conditions – and during the last three decades more and more national religionists have chosen to live in separatist communities apart from their secular siblings. Two nations are beginning to emerge; two nations that rarely interface.

We also created magnificent schools, from day-care centres for six-month-olds to "different strokes for different folks" type yeshiva high schools – running the gamut from Talmud intensive to music and art intensive, from yeshivot hesder of varying philosophies to mechina, one-year preparations for the army and for life.

But these schools were all religious. We did not take seriously many of the social problems plaguing our Israeli society – from forced prostitution and exorbitant interest rates to corruption in the highest places and the ever-climbing poverty graph – and although we were deeply involved in our own education, we seemed to be totally uninterested in the secular educational institutions.

Our founding fathers – although in certain cases addicted to bacon and eggs for breakfast and hardly scrupulous about observing the Sabbath – were deeply committed to the Bible, and were even romantically in love with the land to which they returned, in order to build and by which they hoped to be built. A.D. Gordon, Ahad HaAm, H.N. Bialik, David Ben-Gurion, Levi Eshkol and Yehoshua Cohen were all a far cry from Knesset member Yossi Beilin, who wrote that his grandfather made a mistake for not voting for Uganda in the Zionist Congress and Israeli vice-premier Shimon Peres, who claimed that the new Middle East requires us to aspire to join the Arab League and that Rachel's Tomb and the Cave of the Couples are merely unimportant pieces of real estate in a world in which Tel Aviv alone can become a Hong Kong of the Middle East. No wonder this ever-growing ideological chasm between us has caused us to drift so far apart.

So what must be some of the guidelines emanating from our soul-searching? The main lessons of this disengagement must be our return to normative messianism and the critical necessity of establishing a common language between the religious and secular-based Jewish culture – a Jewish culture for the entire populace of Israel, a Jewish culture that must permeate our music, art and theatre, our community centres and our schools, our TV and our radio – and the counter-establishment of more and more "mixed neighbourhoods" and opportunities for inter-personal dialogue. We must resurrect the initial flag of religious Zionism, our ideals of the land, the Torah-culture and the people – and we must never again allow ourselves to forget the majority of our people in our enthusiasm for land and Torah.

I am convinced that by so doing at the very least we will learn to respect each other – and we may even create the kind of shared culture and values that will transform Israel from a mini-New York to a light unto the nations, from a mirror of a decadent western society to a model for a world of peace and mutual respect.

Profane pulpit pundits

When I'm in Israel, I often send e-mails to friends about the political situation there. I believe that I have enough sense of what is going on in the country to say things that may not be found in the media. In Canada, I refrain from such comments, for here I know little more than what I read in the papers, and others follow the news at least as carefully as I do.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

My aim is not polemical. That is why my e-mail recipients are people I consider to be like-minded. It's also one reason why I don't write about Israeli politics in this column. Another is my fear that the gap in time between when copy is due and when it appears in print will render my comments irrelevant. Hence the more general themes of my CJN reflections.

In making pronouncements on political events, I am colluding with the myth that rabbis have special insights into what is going on in the world in general and the Middle East in particular. As I do not preach nowadays from pulpits, I feel that I can afford to play "expert" via e-mail.

But I remain greatly annoyed by the seemingly incessant political pronouncements from pulpit pundits, whether or not their words are linked to often convoluted and far-fetched references to the weekly portion. I suspect that rabbis prefer politics to Torah because congregants urge them to be "relevant." Theatre is preferable to theology.

When I was a pulpit rabbi, I tried to resist the theatre, because I saw it as part of the secularization of Jewish life. Our very legitimate concerns about what is happening to Jews, especially in the Jewish state, seem to have given us permission to go easy on the mainstay of Judaism through the ages – Torah. The rabbis' fascination with the timely may have obscured their quest for the timeless.

Though the religious-secular dichotomy does not exist in Judaism, we do make a distinction between holy and profane. Politics in the pulpit is of the latter. When words of Torah are replaced by political rants, or even sober analyses, Judaism is being damaged. Though the task of every preacher is to bridge the gap between the eternal and the temporal – between text and context – when the temporal takes centre stage and the eternal is only used for marginal decoration, Judaism is being distorted.

You may wish to bear this in mind next time you hear another fiery salvo from the pulpit for or against disengagement, for or against the separation fence, for or against Ariel Sharon, etc.

The Psalmist's call remains pertinent: "It is time to act for the Lord, for they have violated Your teaching."

The realities of being Jewish on campus

Sometimes being Jewish requires sacrifices and careful planning. This is especially true for Jewish university students.

The Jewish Students' Association at the University of Manitoba is quite small, as are its programs, which take place mainly at restaurants and bars that serve non-kosher food. The core group of people who take part are the same, and participating is sometimes a question of how comfortable you feel hanging out with the same people all the time.

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

As well, kosher food is not available on campus, unless chocolate bars, chips and soft drinks are your major source of sustenance. In truth, packing your own lunch isn't that strenuous, and it's probably better for you both nutritionally and financially.

Another problem: around the world, tensions between pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian student groups are reaching new levels. Often just mentioning that you're Jewish can launch you into an interrogation about your opinions on the Middle East and world politics. Anti-Semitism is on the rise, and pro-Palestinian groups are vocal and intimidating.

I admit that while I am not ashamed of being Jewish and observant, there are times when I am reluctant to broadcast it. When asked by other students why I can't make it to certain classes or exams, I sometimes find myself debating whether to tell them the truth or make up some sort of excuse to avoid a long, futile and annoying conversation about politics.

While frustrating and sometimes more than a little strenuous, these kinds of problems are more or less avoidable. If you take a little care when speaking to acquaintances and in volunteering information, most people will not start conversations on such serious topics without being invited to do so, and innocent questions will generally remain innocent.

But there are some very real problems that simply can't be solved with a little effort, particularly when they have to do with scheduling.

Although there are no Saturday classes at U of M, many conflicts can arise from exams being scheduled for Shabbat or Jewish holidays.

Last year, I had to reschedule three out of my four final exams. For the most part, the professors and the administration were accommodating, requiring only a letter from a rabbi explaining why an exam could not be written on its scheduled date.

But exam dates have turned out to be the least of my problems this year.

This semester is my first in a smaller faculty. Its relatively low number of students translates into little or no choice when it comes to choosing class times. So what happens when only one required class is available and it's scheduled to run after sundown on Friday evening for half of the year? Dropping the class can mean ruining next year's schedule without any guarantee the same problem won't reoccur in 12 months time.

Even worse, Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur, Sukkot, Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah all fall in the middle of the week this year, meaning an observant Jew can only attend eight days of classes in the entire month of October. Even with the most accommodating of professors, the class time missed and the amount of catch-up work to be done is daunting, not to mention that finding a person who takes good notes and is willing to share them can be a challenge.

Scheduling conflicts like these are very stressful, because there are no easy solutions to them. The fact is, you can't make it to class at the scheduled time, and the number of missed classes makes catching up on your own unlikely. Alternate meeting times with professors are severely limited, and private tutors are not always available and are unaffordable for many students.

So how does an observant student cope? I'll let you know when I figure it out.

It requires taking personal responsibility for missed classes and trying to complete assignments in the timeliest way possible, so as not to drown in them.

Ultimately, it comes down to the belief that assignments and tests can be rescheduled and professors can be reasoned with, whereas Jewish holidays cannot.

A survival guide to first year at Dal

For new students, entering the mysterious realm of a university city can be overwhelming.

It isn't easy coming to a new place. The strange surroundings, the new faces, the lack of food selection in the residence dining halls and the overall freedom that a first year student endures can be tough pills to swallow. Having experienced the pleasures and horrors of being a first year student at Dalhousie University – and after living on the rowdiest floor of one of its rowdiest dorms – I know first-hand what it takes to survive.

Matthew Pottens in Halifax

I write this column in order to offer a few suggestions on how to take advantage of a terrific city, Halifax. I also encourage first-year students to get involved in extracurricular activities to give themselves an opportunity to get out of bed and away from the chaos that lurks in the hallway, on the other side of their residence door.

The simplest and most rewarding type of extracurricular activity is participating in intramural or varsity sports. No matter what your sport or skill level, Dalhousie has a team or club to fulfil your athletic desires. There are several intramural leagues that run throughout the academic year, including hockey, basketball, football and ultimate frisbee. There are leagues that tend to be extremely competitive, and leagues for people who just want to have fun and get a little exercise.

And one of the best things about Dal is that if a sport or activity that you like is not immediately available to you, you can create your own club. Organize it, get some friends involved, and just like that, you have done something original for yourself and the rest of the campus. Clubs can range from the environmental club all the way to the tea drinking club. Almost anything goes!

If you're coming to Halifax as a new student, it shouldn't take you long to realize that the name Alexander Keith's represents the pinnacle of the city's enormous bar scene. Alexander Keith's is a beer that's brewed in Halifax, and it's been Haligonians' preferred alcoholic beverage since its creation in 1820. If you're of legal drinking age, I highly recommend taking a walk down to Lower Water Street to check out the original Alexander Keith's brewery. Pay a small fee, and experience a superb night. Actors in 19th century costumes give an informative, musical and beer-filled presentation of the history of the brewery. Doing the tour once is a must – don't you want to learn a little bit about the beverage that makes weekends so exciting?

If beer isn't what you're looking for, you can take advantage of the city's beautiful scenery, starting with the Halifax Public Gardens. The people of Halifax showed their love for this gorgeous site by donating approximately $1 million dollars to restore it when it was nearly destroyed by Hurricane Juan in 2003. It's a wonderful place to relax or get some work done, and keep your eyes out for the hungry ducks that roam the park taking advantage of the nice people and their handfuls of bread.

Another nearby escape for any Dalhousie student is the Dalplex. A monstrous building with multiple basketball, squash, volleyball, badminton and many more courts, the Dalplex is an athlete's fantasy land. It also has an Olympic size swimming pool, saunas, a very modern work-out area and even a rock-climbing wall. It all makes for an excellent place to relieve stress. When work begins to pile up and you find yourself gasping for a minute of free time, the Dalplex has much to offer.

Lastly, if sports isn't what you need to escape the hectic life of a university student and you're looking for something more along the lines of a home cooked meal and a sense of family, join Chabad for a Friday night dinner. They have nice services and all the kosher food and wine you could dream of, and their doors are always open to visitors. Chabad, in association with the Jewish Student Association (JSA), creates many great activities for JSA members throughout the year and they help bring Dal's Jewish students together.

Comedy as a pathway to acceptance in U.S.

As bizarre as it sounds to contemporary ears, Hermann Adler, a 19th-century chief rabbi of London, England, wrote a polemical article defending Jews from the peculiar charge that they have no sense of humour. European thinkers such as Thomas Carlyle and Ernest Renan, who should have known better, propagated this cockeyed theory.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

One might ask: what were they drinking or smoking?

Their accusation was, of course, ridiculous. Throughout the ages, Jews have regarded humour as a therapeutic safety valve to cope with the afflictions of poverty and persecution.

No less an authority than Sigmund Freud understood its importance. In his book, Wit and Its Relation to the Unconscious, published in 1905, he expounded at great length on the role of humour in the release of nervous energy.

Purim, the holiday that celebrates Queen Esther's rescue of Persian Jews from Haman's evil designs, also reflects that reality.

Jews drew on these traditions as pioneers of American comedy, a medium that helped clear a pathway for Jewish acceptance in the United States. "They [Jewish comedians] made Americans comfortable with Jews and Jews comfortable with Americans," writes Lawrence Epstein in The Haunted Smile (Public Affairs), an analysis of that phenomenon.

More than any other segment of the U.S. entertainment industry, Jews dominate comedy. Time magazine once estimated that 80 per cent of professional American comedians are Jewish, even though Jews comprise only about three per cent of America's population.

From Sid Caesar to Jerry Seinfeld, Jews have offered consolation through comedy, which has a special place in American culture. Comedians provided grateful audiences with a welcome diversion from the strains of family and work, says Epstein, a professor of English at Suffolk County Community College in New York state.

As he suggests in this cogent book, their comical skills may have been honed by the Talmud. Jokes, gags and skits, after all, were written by individuals who had learned how to examine a subject from all angles, to search out hidden meanings, to tolerate ambiguity and to recognize contradictions.

But, as Epstein adds, their stage smile was tinged by sadness. They were haunted by the Jewish past. Quoting the psychologist Samuel Janus, who has studied the subject, he explains that Jewish humour emerged from depression and intense alienation. Comedy was thus a defence mechanism to ward off the aggression and hostility of others.

America's embrace of Jewish humour, with its unique insights and inflections, was not all that surprising. Searching for ways to deal with the anxieties of the modern era, Americans looked to Jews, "the masters of handling history's troubles." As Epstein puts it, "An immigrant generation found in the Jews a people repeatedly practised in starting over again in a new place while feeling marginal and scared."

In each generation, Jewish comedians drew on assets their non-Jewish counterparts simply did not possess. They relied on a Yiddish linguistic tradition that prized and rewarded quick thinking and a caustic tongue. They gravitated toward both self-mockery and a mockery of the powerful.

Virtually all were shaped by the distinct rhythms of Yiddish, which were frequently characterized by answering one question with another, framing a rhetorical question and then answering it, talking in a singsong cadence and using a syntax dependent on inverting words in a sentence.

From Milton Berle to Buddy Hackett, many Jewish comedians started their careers in the Catskill mountain resorts, which have declined in recent years. Before the Catskills, they flaunted their jokes in vaudeville, which relied on ethnic stereotyping.

Stereotypes focused on, among other themes, alleged Jewish business practices: "I heard you had a fire last night," Goldberg says. His partner replies, "Ssh. It's tomorrow."

This offensive humour gradually disappeared as society changed and as Jewish comedians such as Fanny Brice dropped jokes and songs that reinforced anti-Semitic animus.

Although George Burns was probably the most successful vaudeville comedian, he was not the first. He was preceded by Jewish dialectician Joe Welch, whose opening line was, "Mebbe you tink I am a heppy man," and by Smith and Dale, whose real names were Joe Sultzer and Charlie Marks.

Jack Benny, one of the greatest comedians of his day, harped on his parsimoniousness. In a legendary skit, a robber exclaimed, "Your money or your life." Benny answered, "I'm thinking it over."

Epstein claims that Benny's take on cheapness did not encourage anti-Semitism. Audiences found his character weaknesses endearing rather than venomous.

The Marx Brothers, who appeared in a succession of popular Hollywood movies, specialized in mocking the very society they supposedly admired. Gertrude Berg, in The Goldbergs, starred in a radio show that was a cross between a situation comedy and a soap opera.

The Marx Brothers

The Three Stooges, initially consisting of Moses Horwitz, his brother Samuel, and Louis Feinberg, perfected the art of slapstick in low-budget films ranging from Hokus Pocus to Malice in the Palace and in three anti-Nazi spoofs.

Danny Kaye, who represented the confused insider, appeared in several late 1930s films. His movie career took off only after he was signed on by mogul Samuel Goldwyn, who had expressed concern that his prominent nose made him look too Jewish. Goldwyn settled for Kaye dying his red hair blond.

According to Epstein, Sid Caesar was probably the most complex comedian of his time. His use of silence and his ability to mimic language were second to none.

Phil Silvers, of Sergeant Bilko fame, shot to prominence after hosting a White House show for President Dwight Eisenhower. Myron Cohen started telling jokes as a garment salesman. Encouraged by his customers' response, Cohen headed to the Catskills and Miami, where his warmly anecdotal stories were a hit.

Shecky Greene was one of the first comedians of his epoch to talk openly about his Jewish background, while Alan King was the epitome of the put-upon suburbanite.

Mort Sahl walked a thin line, challenging and alienating the audience. Unlike Sahl, Lenny Bruce was apolitical. But he was so fond of using sexually charged language and obscenities that he ran afoul of the law. Jackie Mason's forte continues to be self-deprecatory humour. By talking in a heavy Jewish accent, he has created a unique identity.

Woody Allen, whose persona is the classic shlemiel, began as a writer and stand-up comedian before branching into films. Epstein rates Annie Hall as his breakthrough movie.

Mel Brooks, Allen's rival for the title of funniest writer, converted the film The Producers into an uncommonly successful Broadway play, which won 12 Tony awards.

Jerry Lewis, a Catskill regular, became famous after teaming up with a young Italian singer named Dean Martin. Don Rickles took insult humour to a new level. Jerry Seinfeld discovered humour in everyday situations.

By any yardstick, Jewish comedians stand at the very centre of American humour. But, as Epstein reminds us, they can thank centuries of adversity for their wit.

Toronto synagogues in process of merging

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Members of Adath Sholom Congregation are planning to celebrate the High Holidays this year at Beth Tikvah Synagogue. As of last week, the two synagogues were in the final stages of completing a merger.

Adath Sholom's building on Sheppard Ave. W. was sold a year ago to Congregation Darchei Noam, and the congregation was looking to amalgamate with another synagogue. The building sale will close Oct. 31.

In 2001, a merger with Beit Rayim Synagogue in Richmond Hill was announced, but plans fell through two years later.

Adath Sholom president Morey Eckler said he is happy about the plans, and that Beth Tikvah has been very welcoming. "We're absolutely thrilled."

Because Eckler's 300-family congregation had no school, rabbi or youth programs, there was no incentive for younger people to join, he said. "We're getting to be an older congregation," said Eckler, 79.

Services at the two synagogues are similar, said Eckler. Beth Tikvah, which is affiliated with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, is traditional Conservative in style. Unlike Adath Sholom, however, Beth Tikvah does not allow women to have aliyot, he noted.

Beth Tikvah, which will not undergo a name change, can absorb all the Adath Sholom members at its existing services, said Beth Tikvah president Jerry Klasner. The synagogue will also provide space for Adath Sholom's memorabilia and memorial tablets "to recognize the uniqueness and the history of their synagogue," he added.

Adath Sholom dates back to 1926, when it was established as a social club called the Young Men's Minsker Farband.

Eckler, who joined in 1948, remembers when the club became a synagogue in the 1950s. The impetus came from a representative of the City of Toronto who noted that if it were a synagogue, the club would save money on property taxes.

Members took the idea very seriously, recalls Eckler, who travelled to New York to purchase prayer books for the fledgling synagogue from a publishing house. His in-laws donated the first Torah, and services were held every morning, in addition to Saturdays and holidays.

"It's a good match and a good partnership," said Klasner.

JF&CS social worker says goodbye after 30 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

After more than 30 years at Jewish Family & Child Service, Teri Kay credits her clients with teaching her about life.

Recently retired after spending the last 23 years as director of family and community services, Kay, who graduated from University of Calgary with a degree in social work, says she knows that "but for the grace of God, I would be in their place.

"Some people [fall onto hard times] because of unforeseen circumstances such as sickness, divorce or unemployment, but they are people who for the most part, have the same values as us. Life interfered, however. I have learned that no one is immune."

Since she started working at JF&CS, her first job in Toronto – she was born in Saskatchewan and later moved to British Columbia – she says she has seen the agency move north as the community moved north.

"I started working at JF&CS when it was a small agency on Beverly Street [in downtown Toronto] and it had just opened a branch at Lawrence Plaza. Back then, we were one of the leaders in the family services movement, and we became known for the quality of our counselling services," says Kay, who together with her husband of 42 years has two grown children.

"Our services grew as the needs of the community changed, and it followed the community further north [to the Lipa Green Building with a branch at Promenade Mall in Thornhill]."

Terri Kay

"We also worked closely with the poor, and that has continued to be our focus. That is the hallmark of JF&CS."

The Jewish community has a substantial number of people who have to make choices, she says. "They have to decide whether to cut down on food or cut out their medicine if they're not covered. These are serious choices.

"I saw a woman whose eight-year-old child lost his mittens, and she had to choose between buying him mittens or buying him a present to take with to a birthday party. Imagine living on such limited income in a city like Toronto."

She has always stayed connected to the clients, she says. "That is where I learned life's lessons. I have worked with survivors of broken marriages and domestic violence, and with kids who have been abused – people who have managed to put their lives back together.

"There are many success stories. One single mom who had escaped an abusive marriage needed financial help so she could have a decent place to live. She was able to put her kids in a stable environment, and she began disclosing her personal problems so she could get emotional support.

"As a result, she met other women in similar circumstances, and her kids received individual counselling. Three years later, she has been retrained and is moving on with her life. This is a typical story."

When someone comes to the agency, they have access to a number of services, she says, many of them free. "We try to make the services as 'seamless' as possible. I have heard JF&CS compared to a department store. You enter on the ground floor, but then you discover something you need on the second floor, and maybe something else on the third floor. It's all there in one spot."

She has retired, she says, but she is not cutting her ties to the agency. She is interim executive director until Richard Cummings, past JF&CS president, takes over the reins in January, and she has been appointed director emerita, the first time at JF&CS that the title has been bestowed. "This has been my life's work, and being given this title is a tremendous honour.

"I'm proud to be part of this incredible community, and I can say that because I am not from here. I would not have missed this for the world. We are lucky from every vantage point, for our volunteers, for our professionals, and for the people that work in the community."

Beyond the agency, she has taken on the position of executive director of the Ontario Network for the Prevention of Elder Abuse, a provincial advocacy organization.

"Reaching this age [of retirement] has been very freeing for me. I can do things I've wanted to do."

Democratization: Is It For Real?

Democratization of previously undemocratic or tyrannical societies is an idea in the air and an emerging reality in places on the ground. For some, this phenomenon is revolutionary and important; for others, democratization is American hubris at its worst. This series, featuring some of the most compelling voices of our time, examines this explosive and significant issue.

On the street where you live

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

The 1911 census of Canada, which became available to the public in mid-July for the first time, is a tremendously valuable resource for family tree researchers whose relatives were in Canada in the first decade of the 20th century. It's the latest in a wave of genealogical resources – the Ellis Island data base being foremost among them – that are easily accessible via the Internet.

If you have high-speed Internet access, each page comes up in convenient PDF format in only a few seconds. For each entry, the census lists name, address, marital status, month and year of birth, age, country or place of birth, year of immigration and naturalization, racial or tribal origin, nationality, religion, occupation, literacy skills, mother tongue and other variables.

Although the information offered is extraordinary, it's not so easy to find a given person at a given address. Unlike Ellis Island passenger records, the 1911 census is not searchable by name or any other personal variable. It also lacks a centralized street index.

To search for a particular address, you must use a hit-and-miss method of navigation, somewhat like playing Battleship. You search a city, sector by sector and block by block, using district numbers, sub-district numbers and various keywords related to wards, municipalities and neighbourhoods.

The search requires logic, intuition, guesswork and patience. Consultation with the regional maps on the website is highly recommended.

To date, I've searched through hundreds of census pages, mostly in Toronto but as far west as Brandon, Man., and as far east as Kingston, Ont. In Toronto, I've explored the major downtown streets and the heavily Jewish neighbourhoods in Ward 3 and the Junction. So far, I've found a growing list of relatives, including a grandfather and several great-grandparents.

Generally speaking, these census pages offer researchers a rare and privileged glimpse into the past. They are filled with names of people, mostly Canadian, of Scottish, Irish, British, German, Welsh, Polish, French, Romanian, Chinese and Dutch descent. The eldest, born in the 1820s and 1830s, might have held young grandchildren and great-grandchildren on their laps who are still alive today.

Because of privacy and confidentiality concerns, the 1911 census might never have been released. A coalition of genealogists, historians and special-interest groups began lobbying the government in the late 1990s to enact the legislation necessary for the release of the 1911 census and all subsequent censuses, which would otherwise have been kept private forever.

The necessary legislation – Bill S-18, an act to amend the Statistics Act – seemed about to die earlier this summer before it could be given a third reading. But on June 28, deputy government whip Dominic LeBlanc received the Speaker's permission to introduce Bill S-18 on the assurance that it would likely face no opposition. Sure enough, it was passed with the unanimous consent of all members of the House of Commons.

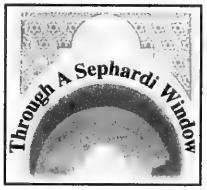
Library and Archives Canada took only a few weeks to make the scanned images of every census page available on its Canadian Genealogy Centre website. Traffic to the site was so high during the first week that many could only gain access to it after midnight. Even now, the site may be a bit sluggish between peak usage hours of 9 a.m. and 4 p.m.

For families that arrived in Canada prior to June 1911, the census is a gold mine, and Library and Archives Canada deserves enormous credit for making it available. To attempt a search, visit the Canadian Genealogy Centre website at www.genealogy.gc.ca , click on Databases, then scroll down to the 1911 Census. Feel free to let me know how your search turns out.

Keeping up those family ties

This year marks the 50th anniversary of the arrival of the first Moroccan immigrants. The following column is part of a series.

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON



All the very real challenges of immigration pale in comparison to the pain of leaving family behind in the old country. One could overcome language, earn a livelihood and put up with a harsher climate, but the division of a family was often unbearable.

In Morocco, family life was such that an entire clan functioned as one body. Aunts would raise nephews and nieces as their own. Brothers would work together. Shabbat and holidays were celebrated as a single large clan. As a result, for an immigrant, no enjoyment or experience took place without expressing the sentiment, "If only my mother could see this," or "If only I could send one of these to my sister."

In those days, the world was certainly not as small as it is today. One simply did not get on a plane to go for a visit. Bittersweet memories linger of occasions and life-cycle events that would come and go without important family members in attendance.

Long distance phone calls were possible, but woefully inadequate and quite expensive. Such calls were most often made after much planning and scheduling, and usually before Rosh Hashanah and Pesach, or for a celebration.

The sheer glee of hearing the voice of a loved one was overwhelming. The conversations usually went as such:

"Hello my dear, is that you?"

"Yes my dear, is that you?"

"How are you, my loved one?"

"Fine, and how are you?"

After the receiver had been passed to several individuals, who would all proceed to repeat this very exchange word for word – but in a louder and more excited fashion – someone would inevitably remind the rest that this was a long distance call. The exchanges, which weren't really conversations at all, would conclude with good wishes and long distance kisses and hugs. Afterward, families on both sides of the Atlantic would sit and review every word, nuance and tone – over and over again.

Yet, as exciting as these calls were for all, they were in no way satisfying or sufficient to nurture family ties. As a result, a high priority for most newcomers was to bring as many members of their families to Canada as possible.

Fortunately, at that time, Canada saw itself as geographically vast and sorely underpopulated, so a newcomer was allowed to sponsor the immigration of immediate family members – parents, children and siblings. Under the existing points system, things such as age, education, marital status and health would score points for the applicant. The sponsor, for his part, was required to provide proof of awaiting employment and residence, and undertake that the applicant would not become a burden to Canada's social assistance programs.

The migration of entire families, spanning three generations, was realized through this system of sponsorship. These arrivals and reunions would be quite emotional, and the settled member of the family would lovingly – and with great pride – mentor his family in the ways of the new world.

The making of a terrorist

The Martyr's Oath: The Apprenticeship of a Homegrown Terrorist* by Stewart Bell, published by Wiley.

What goes into the making of a terrorist? Consider the unlikely case of Mohammed Mansour Jabbarah, also known to his friends and colleagues as "Sammy."

Books
Bernard Baskin

Reared and educated in St. Catharines, Ont., the son of middle-class hardworking immigrants from Kuwait, Jabbarah was personable, articulate, friendly, intelligent – and a fierce and murderous zealot.

At 14, he was persuaded to become an Islamic holy warrior. At 18, he was training in Afghanistan, eager to fight in Chechnya or Israel. A year later, he swore an oath of allegiance to Osama bin Laden and prepared for his first terrorist assignment, the bombing of American and Israeli embassies in Singapore, as well as other public and commercial buildings.

Jabbarah was an ideal pawn for Al Qaeda: he carried a Canadian passport, spoke unaccented English and was smart and worldly.

The author of this astonishing account of how a young Canadian was recruited, trained and sent on a mission of death is certain that if Jabbarah's plan had succeeded, several thousand persons would have perished.

Fortunately, the poorly conceived attempt was botched and Jabbarah, eventually captured in Oman, was deported to Canada. In the hands of Canadian intelligence, he became a willing fountain of vital information. He identified 13 leading Al Qaeda figures with whom he had been in direct contact. Bell makes clear that for all of his bluster about jihad and martyrdom, Jabbarah was singing like a bird.

Jabbarah had broken no Canadian laws and could not be prosecuted in this country. Actually, some Canadian civil liberties and Muslim activists groups protested that he was a political prisoner. But Jabbarah realized that there was no escape from American intelligence agencies, and decided voluntarily to co-operate with them, hoping that he would be rewarded with leniency. CSIS turned him over to the FBI.

How are we to understand or explain the terrorist mind? For Bell, none of the many theories offered is completely compelling. He writes, "In the end, perhaps it comes down to this. We are all searching for meaning and purpose in a world of confusion. And so when someone comes along with an explanation that makes simple sense of the world and explains our place in it, and gives us something to believe in, to be a part of, it can be a powerful thing… All that matters is having something to join, something to believe in and something to belong to."

Is terrorism a danger to Canada? The author reveals that in 2004 CSIS began admitting openly that it was not a matter of if Canada would be attacked, but when. Approximately 100 "hard-core" Islamic extremists were known to be operating in this country, 70 of them in the Toronto area.

Stewart Bell is a senior reporter at Canada's National Post. He is an award-winning investigative journalist and foreign correspondent. The Martyr's Oath includes detailed accounts of counter-terrorism operations across the Middle East, Southeast Asia and North America, as well as information obtained from interviews and top-secret documents.

The vast majority of Canadian Muslims are law abiding and opposed to violence; the true spirit of the Qur'an condemns barbarity and the spilling of innocent blood. Bell, however, urges vigilance in the face of a growing threat. He warns that the jihad factory that turns pliant youths into killers for God is in full production, and until it is shut down, it will continue to mass-produce terrorists who will haunt us for years to come.

Jews of the Deep South

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The tragedy of Hurricane Katrina has focused the world's attention on the lives destroyed and damage done to the people of the Gulf Coast. For Jewish communities, the hurricane and subsequent relief effort has also put into focus the small but historic Jewish communities that dot the South.

As early as two centuries ago, Jews fleeing Prussian draft policies arrived in New Orleans looking to make new lives for themselves. Some made the city home; others trudged north to the towns of the Mississippi Delta. The once-healthy Jewish communities in places like Natchez, Port Gibson and Woodville are gone, but Macy Hart says they must not be forgotten. Hart, the founder of the Museum of the Southern Jewish Experience, is profiled in a colourful feature article that Preservation magazine did in 2000. Click on Dixie Diaspora to read it. [www.msje.org/news/html]

Photographer Bill Aron and writer, and Mississippian Vicki Reikes Fox spent 14 years "capturing the convergence of two distinct but surprisingly interwoven communities – one Southern, one Jewish." The result of their efforts was a 2002 photographic exhibit. Aron and Fox's work is still available as a book and a dozen of the images are online. [www.billaron.com/shalom/shalom.html]

As you look at those remarkable photos, here is a treat for your ears. Take an aural tour of Greenwood, Mississippi's Ahavath Rayim, the last Orthodox synagogue in the state. In 1991, radio producer David Isay created a documentary for National Public Radio's All Things Considered about the special people of Greenwood. A lovely 12-minute sound portrait. [www.soundportraits.org/on-air/mississippi_jews/]

Growing up in the Deep South in the 1950s and '60s, Edward Cohen always felt more than a bit different. And never did those differences feel more pronounced than when he and his father tried to fit in. Hunting, of course, was out. But fishing wasn't much better. [www.usadeepsouth.com/article1188.html]

For a taste of contemporary life in the South, you can read the story in Forward of Lauren Antler and how the New Yorker found herself teaching Hebrew at an eight-pupil, one-room school in Greenville, Miss. [http://tinyurl. com/d9p56]

The Institute of Southern Jewish Life, created a decade ago, provides advice about historic preservation, collects oral histories, assists in southern Jewish genealogy and organizes rabbinic services and Jewish education to small and isolated communities. It has also been heavily involved in hurricane relief. [www.msje.org]

As for life after Katrina, I recommend two websites that go beyond the headlines and give you a feeling for how life has changed for the Jewish and general communities in the South. Both sites are blogs and both are very well done.

The Deep South Jewish Voice's blog is particularly interesting because it includes photographs. There are shots of Biloxi's beautiful Beth Israel that, "despite being two blocks from the beach… is still standing, though heavily damaged." And there are pictures of acts of kindness, such as the note tacked to a bulletin board at a shelter for evacuees in Alabama that says, "Need a place for Shabbos?"

And then there are messages about the determination to go on. Last year, Hattiesburg, Mississippi's B'nai Israel congregation was forced to cancel High Holy Day services due to Hurricane Ivan. Rabbi Celso Cukierkorn has vowed, "We're not doing that this year." [www.dsjv.com/]

The other must-read is the online diary of Rabbi Yochanan Rivkin, director of Chabad at New Orleans' Tulane University. [http://tinyurl.com/9qhhl]

And as for the future, that's where you can help. Several communal organizations and Jewish federations – in conjunction with United Jewish Communities [http://tinyurl.com/abws9] – have established relief funds. You can find information about donating to Toronto's fund [http://tinyurl. com/dwvzs] and Montreal's. [http://tinyurl.com/bleue]

Other Jewish organizations are involved in raising money for disaster relief, too. [http://tinyurl.com/cths4] This list is not comprehensive. You should always check out any organization before you donate to it, online or not.

Senior saves his friend's life with CPR

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When Murray Fruchtman's world suddenly came crashing down, he couldn't have asked for a better friend than Abbey Grossman to be there for life-saving support.

Fruchtman, 83, collapsed right into Grossman while they were strolling through Yorkdale Mall recently.

As they fell onto the floor, Grossman immediately realized his chum of more than 50 years was seriously imperiled.

"I started checking for a pulse under his neck and then on his wrist and I couldn't get one," Grossman relates.

"He looked like he was dead."

Despite the tragedy unfolding before him, the 82-year-old stayed calm and administered cardiopulmonary resuscitation, commonly known as CPR.

"I placed my hands over his chest by his sternum and started giving him resuscitation," Grossman says in a matter of fact tone.

"I pressed down several times and then I got the first gasp out of him."

Paramedics arrived on the scene and tended to Fruchtman.

He is presently in the hospital, somewhat frail, but happy to be alive.

For his efforts, Grossman was recently presented with Toronto Emergency Medical Services' Citizen's Award and Heart-In-Motion award.

He will also likely be the recipient of Heart and Stroke Foundation honours and an award from St. John's ambulances.

While appreciative of the kudos, Grossman doesn't seem to think what he did was extraordinary.

"People come and congratulate me and that's nice," says the retired pharmacist, who learned CPR in school some 60 years ago.

"But I really don't dwell on it."

Paramedics, on the other hand, definitely want to dwell on it and spread the word about CPR's life-saving potential.

"What Abbey did was truly remarkable," enthuses Garrie Wright, a supervisor at Toronto EMS.

"The outcome would have been tragically different if he hadn't."

Indeed, Grossman's quick reaction not only saved Fruchtman's life, but likely averted permanent consequences, including brain damage.

Wright is co-ordinating the Toronto CPR Challenge, whereby free CPR workshops will be set up at community and senior's centres across the city.

The 45-minute workshops will include "nuts and bolts" CPR training, tips on how to recognize a heart attack or stroke and information on 9-1-1 services.

"We want to target seniors [at the workshops] because they're the ones who will likely run into [using CPR]," Wright says.

Statistics show that Torontonians are not particularly adept in CPR.

Only about 14 per cent of Toronto's population is certified in CPR, compared to 80 per cent of people living in Seattle, Wash.

It's no surprise then that Seattle's survival rate when it comes to sudden cardiac arrest is 20 per cent, whereas Toronto's is only 2.5 per cent.

The numbers are at the heart of Wright's motivation to run the challenge.

"This is the first year we're doing the CPR challenge and...we're trying to get the biggest bang out of it we can," says Wright, adding the goal is to train about 1,500 people at the workshops.

"Next year, we would love this to blossom into us training thousands of people."

The challenge will kick off in the last week of September and culminate on Oct. 1 and 2.

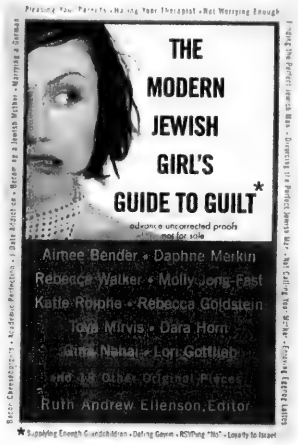
Guilty women are not alone

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Whether you're shomer Shabbat or can't tell the difference between an etrog and a lemon, there is one aspect of life that many Jewish woman have in common: Jewish guilt.

In The Modern Jewish Girl's Guide to Guilt, editor Ruth Andrew Ellenson compiled essays written by Jewish woman who examine the complications associated with being Jewish and female in the 21st century.



In the introduction, Ellenson, who was born in Jerusalem and raised in New York by parents who are both rabbis, struggles with a question that each reader must answer for themselves: "How much do we owe to our heritage and how much should we follow our hearts?

"Has Judaism survived pogroms, the Holocaust, and countless other calamities only to be lost as we give into temptation to eat a bacon cheeseburger or marry a frat boy named Chip Christianson? Or am I really free to live and love as I see fit? After all, why should the future of Judaism rest entirely on my shoulders?" Ellenson asks.

She explains that to be part of a Jewish community, we are both embraced and judged by it.

"We are loved because we belong, but when we break away we are met with cries condemning our selfishness… And so the guilt begins again."

This, she says, is the fundamental struggle that Jewish women share. The confusion begins when women are forced to chose between their needs and the expectations of the community.

"Some of us carry the load heavily upon their shoulders, subjecting ourselves to endless hours of self-doubt and criticism (a talent many Jews excel at), while others attempt to shrug it off or laugh at its absurdity," she writes.

"Either way, it's hard not to be acutely aware of guilt's presence, whether its source is in the synagogue or in the family."

In Lori Gottlieb's case, it is her mother who is the source of her guilt.

In My Private Caller, Gottlieb defines the horrors of maintaining a relationship between a Jewish mother and daughter.

"My mother's not abusive or even mean-spirited. She's just, well, Jewish," writes Gottlieb, an author and columnist. "Which means she loves me more than life itself, but nothing I do is good enough, even though I'm perfect, because after all, I take after her."

She describes the lengths she'll go to just to avoid talking to her mother on the phone. When she pretends she needs to take an important call on her cell phone, her mother quickly asks, "Okay, but honey, are you all right? Are you happy?"

When Gottlieb tells her mother that she is happy, she answers with a response that seems all too familiar:

"If you were so happy, you'd have time to talk to your mother."

As infuriating as her mother's guilt trips are, Gottlieb can't seem to keep herself from coming back for more hard love.

In Girl Meets Goy, Francesca Segrè, an author and TV reporter, describes her difficulty in trying to fight off her attraction to men of diverse backgrounds to settle with a good Jewish boy.

When she graduated from college and "had male limbs of most every colour wrapped around [her] at one point or another," Segrè moved in with her observant Jewish boyfriend only to discover that the pressure to be a good Jewish girlfriend was too much for her to handle.

"The more he shoved Judaism down my throat, the more I felt suffocated by it. I resented his rigid and sometimes blind adherence to Jewish law. I mean, come on. No marshmallows in the house, unless they are kosher marshmallows?"

Still, although she ended up back where she started, being fascinated by and attracted to men of different religious and cultural backgrounds – and coming to terms with her vice – she still couldn't shake that feeling in the pit of her stomach.

After hitting it off with an Asian man who claimed food as his religion, she asked herself, "Where were my tribal loyalties? My Holocaust-surviving grandparents would've been mystified if they lived to see me marry an Asian man. Committing to him could disappoint my family. It might even disappoint me."

Each essay, whether it discusses being a Jewish lesbian, fighting a non-Jewish spouse about putting a Christmas tree in the house, or the guilt associated with getting a pedicure on Yom Kippur, is meant to touch a personal chord with any modern Jewish woman living in North America.

Ellenson says that regardless of whether a Jewish woman rejects the religious aspect of being a Jew, few can escape the feeling that "our choices not only affect us, but future generations of the tribe."

While this compilation of essays may not be able to free Jewish women from the guilt they feel when they skip the Rosh Hashanah service in favour of a movie, it is meant to comfort those who think they're alone.

"Most of us have more than enough people in our lives who are ready to make us feel guilty. But you aren't alone – in fact you're surrounded by women who are struggling to define themselves and be true to Judaism at the same time."

Rescue means the promise of a better life.

We're helping to create a life of promise.

The remarkable aliyah of Ethiopian Jewry, funded by UJA Federation's overseas partner, the Jewish Agency, is one of Israel's most celebrated achievements. And an additional 20,000 Ethiopians will be arriving over the next three years.

But the challenges faced by Israel's Ethiopian community are immense. A staggering 70% of Ethiopians in Israel live below the poverty line.

The struggle to secure a brighter future for Ethiopian young people is urgent.

Campaign 2006 contributions will fund special tutoring, tutition scholarships and vocational training for Ethiopian youth. It's one of many measures to rebuild young Israeli lives after five years of constant terror attacks.

UJA Federation Campaign 2006 is powered by three strategic commitments to create a world of good on behalf of our children:

- Social Justice - assisting Toronto's poor and vulnerable
- Rebuilding Israeli lives after five years of terror attacks
- Connecting Jewish youth to Jewish life

Help us keep the promise. For a World of Good.

L'Chaim DVD to educate women about cancer

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

L'Chaim Support Group for Jewish Women, formed in 1999 by cancer survivors to help other Jewish women cope with cancer, has produced a DVD titled, What Every Jewish Women Should Know About Cancer.

Elizabeth Ehrlich, a co-founder of L'Chaim with Marci Tenenbaum says, "The DVD will educate and empower Jewish women about cancer risk, detection and treatment.

"It is ideal for Jewish women and groups wishing to learn how to be pro-active about their health."

The DVD includes speakers who made presentations at a community-wide cancer awareness seminar last year at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

The 62-minute DVD, which can be viewed in any one of seven sections or the entire presentation, is both educational and inspirational.

Tenenbaum presents the history of L'Chaim, and speaks of her personal odyssey with cancer and the importance of both confidential peer support and reaching out to others.

Ehrlich talks about finding resources in the Jewish community and how the outreach program at L'Chaim has assisted many women who are encountering and coping with cancer.

Dr. Ellen Warner, lead researcher on a genetic study of Jewish women with breast cancer and a consultant to L'Chaim, speaks on "Are Jewish Women at Greater Risk for Breast or Ovarian Cancer."

A medical oncologist at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre, she speaks of risk factors such as family history, inherited genetic abnormalities and early symptoms of breast cancer.

In a presentation on colorectal cancer by Dr. Steven Gallinger, senior investigator of the program in molecular biology and cancer at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute at Mount Sinai Hospital, and professor in the department of surgery at the University of Toronto, he says that the disease is 100 per cent preventable.

He notes that anti-inflammatories and low doses of aspirin can reduce the chance of developing polyps which may lead to cancer.

Cancer survivor, Rosie Sherman speaks on "How to Reach Out and Help a Friend Undergoing Cancer Treatment."

L'Chaim's president, Marsha Urowitz acknowledges the support the organization receives from the community.

Complimentary copies of the DVD are going to the patient resource centres of all cancer facilities throughout Canada as well as cancer groups such as Wellspring and Willow. Newly diagnosed Jewish cancer patients will also receive the DVD in their gift bags.

For individuals or groups who would like to order the DVD, there is a $15 (Cdn) and $12 (US) charge to help defray the cost of production.

To contact L'Chaim for support or to order the DVD, call 416-630-0203, e-mail helengreenberg@sympatico.ca, or write to L'Chaim, c/o 5 Canary Cres., Toronto, Ont., M2K 1Y9.

Cuba mission successful

The Canadian friends of Cuban Jewry (CFCJ) recently welcomed back its 94th mission to Cuba, where it operated its annual summer camp, the Alex Simona Shnaider Camp Gan Israel Cuba for Havana's Jewish children.

The CFCJ's emissaries left for Cuba well stocked with provisions needed to give the Jewish children an educational and fun-filled summer.

"It is an opportunity for the children to have hands-on experience learning all about our heritage," says Rabbi Shimon Aisenbach, director of Canadian Friends of Cuban Jewry. "Many ideas introduced in the summer are continued on through the year, all due to the strong impression and education our emissaries give them."

The children were also taken to tourist areas to relax and play. Excursions and activities included boating and horseback riding, the zoo and the aquarium.

Children were provided with supplies for arts and crafts, and produced projects based on Jewish themes.

Campers and their parents also received a daily lunch, and transportation from home to camp.

In addition, the CFCJ placed a number of children of Jewish Cuban families in different camps in North America.

"These children joined our educational activities in Cuba, and later after immigrating abroad, and as result of their financial difficulties, we have completely undertaken the sponsoring of their summer camp in a few Jewish summer camps here in Canada and in the United States," Rabbi Aisenbach said.

Last month, the organization again sent a mohel to perform another brit milah for a young man on the island.

The group is now preparing for its High Holy Day programs, when it will send its 95th and 96th missions to Cuba to provide material and spiritual assistance for the remaining Jewish community.

Toronto's twenty year bond still strong with Israeli community

UJA Federation offers scholarships to students of Kfar Gvirol

By DVORA WILSHANSKY
UJA Federation

Fifty students in what was once a drug ridden neighborhood near Rechovot are cementing ties that go back two decades and are receiving tuition scholarships from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. The bond between Toronto's Jewish community and Israel's Rechovot region began in 1983 with Project Renewal, Jewish Agency initiative through which UJA Federation of Greater Toronto helped transform the neighbourhood of Kfar Gvirol from a neglected, drug-infested area into a thriving community.

Since then, the neighbourhood has come a long way. In fact, UJA Federation President Ted Sokolsky and UJA Federation's Board Chair David Engel were in Kfar Gvirol recently to personally award the scholarships to the students.

"When we started to work with the community more than 20 years ago I think there were two students who graduated with these awards, and today there are over 50 of you," Engel told the lucky scholarship recipients. "I look forward to working with you, and to being with you for many more years to come, as our communities grow together. "

The ceremony was held at the Kfar Gvirol Early Childhood Centre, established in 1988 - the first UJA Federation project in the neighbourhood. Some of the scholarship recipients used to attend the centre years ago, and today bring their own children to the facility.

Sokolsky remembers his first visit to Kfar Gvirol 19 years earlier because it was just before his first son was born. "I know in all these years many visitors and volunteers from Toronto have come here and partnered with you in helping your community grow," said Sokolsky. "Everyone here has been thanking us for what we've done for Kfar Gvirol, but the truth of the matter is that you've done a lot more for us, as Jews living in the Diaspora. We are the ones who are stronger Jews, who feel better about what we do at home, and who feel united with you more than ever."

Sivan Yaish, who attended the Early Childhood Centre when she was three months old, was one of those who received a scholarship which will help her study accounting.

"I didn't have money to learn," said Yaish. "I don't live with my parents, but with my grandmother. She supports us from her pension, and she doesn't have any spare money. I really had to persuade her to help me study, and I promised I'd pay her back in four years, after I finish the army and find some work. This money from Toronto will go to my grandmother, not to me." she says.

"What was really special about the ceremony," said Engel, "was the diversity of the recipients, from so many different origins and countries. It was really an indication of Israeli society today in terms of the olim who came years ago."

Cooking the Jewish Toronto way

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

People can't seem to get enough information about food; where to buy it, how to prepare it and the right way to eat it. In response to this increasing obsession with all things edible, UJA Federation has created a new web feature, Cooking Jewish in Toronto beginning September 19th. It can be found on Doing Jewish in Toronto, a component of UJA Federation's website, www.jewishtoronto.com. The idea for Cooking Jewish in Toronto was initiated by UJA Federation's Jewish Information Service of Toronto.

Cooking Jewish will highlight full holiday menus and innovative recipes for Friday night dinners.

As an added benefit, a different Jewish organization will supply a new Shabbat dinner menu each week, offering the community interesting food ideas along with information about each organization and the community resources it offers. To launch this new project UJA Federation has enlisted the help of six of Toronto's finest cooking connoisseurs. The mavens, Nettie Cronish, Norene Gilletz, Daphna Rabinovitch, Rose Reisman, Rosie Schwartz, and Lucy Waverman have all donated some of their best recipes to help with this innovative project.

"I'm very excited about this great endeavor," Eleanor Mintz, Volunteer Chair of Cooking Jewish in Toronto, explained. "We were so lucky to get these cooking mavens and organizations to work with us and help with the project. I can't wait to hear the reaction from those visiting the site."

"A Better Than Bubbie's Chicken Soup Contest" through which individuals are invited to e-mail their chicken soup recipes is also being held for those in the community who may be cooking mavens themselves. The winner of the contest will receive a Friday night dinner for six courtesy of GMB Catering. Finalists will be asked to a chicken soup cook-off on November 27th, at the Lipa Green building where Susan Jackson, Director The Centre Jewish Knowledge and Heritage of UJA Federation, David Gale Gemini award winning host of Loving Spoonfuls and Michael Posner, arts reporter from the Globe and Mail will judge the event.

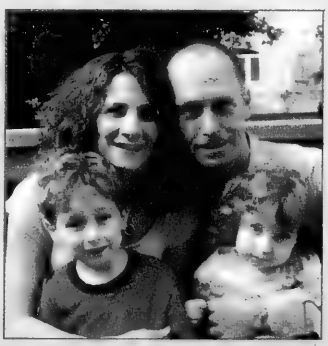
"This whole idea was conceived as I listened to two young women chatting about recipes and what to prepare for their young families." Minzt said. "Everybody seems really fascinated by cooking and preparing wholesome food for the people they love. I'm glad we have this available for the community. It's a great service and we are happy to offer it."

Website takes anxiety out of High Holidays

The High Holidays are fast approaching with Rosh Hashanah beginning at sundown on October 3rd. For many, the High Holidays mean familiarity and warmth yet for some the holidays can breed anxiety about finding a synagogue in which to pray. UJA Federation's Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto (JIST) offers a comprehensive list of every High Holiday prayer service available in Toronto and the surrounding area, helping to alleviate some of the doubt.

The list is accessible by clicking the High Holiday Seating button at the UJA Federation website, www.jewishtoronto.com. The list, which is also available in hard copy at various synagogues, community centres and libraries, offers 15 pages of High Holiday service options in Toronto, and surrounding areas with ticket prices for each included. The services are grouped by affiliation and there is a special section dedicated to seniors with information where they can go to find services especially geared to them.

Debra Boxer and her husband Mark, originally from Montreal have been living in Toronto for years, but only recently with the birth of their two children decided to spend Rosh Hashanah at home instead of driving east down the 401.



Debra and Mark Boxer with Matthew and Zoe

"My children are now old enough to know what the holidays are and why they are important," Debra explained. "My son who is four, is now at day school, and I think it's important to continue his Jewish education at home. We weren't affiliated with a synagogue so I used the website to find a listing of the synagogues and to see what was available. It saved me a lot of time, it's a great resource."

"I know it can be a daunting task if you are a newcomer and you just don't know where to even begin," said Barbara Barak, JIST senior coordinator. "Even if you have been living here your whole life this listing is valuable."

"People go through all kinds of life changes and are always looking for information," said Faigie Abrahamovitz, a JIST volunteer." People call all the time looking for places to go for the holidays. It's a great service and I'm glad we can help."

Campaign 2006 inspires a new generation

UJA Federation total already over $23 million

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

UJA Federation Campaign 2006 has already raised $23 million after its official launch September 1st. The campaign, committed to Jewish youth at risk is seeking an additional $10 million over three years. Campaign 2006 will focus on three strategic pillars:

- Social justice providing for Toronto's poor and vulnerable
- Rebuilding Israeli lives after five years of terrorism
- Connecting Jewish youth to Jewish life

With the campaign centring on Jewish youth, it is not surprising that UJA Federation is cultivating a younger generation to carry on the philanthropic torch of their elders. At two campaign pre-launch receptions for younger community members, participants met with contemporaries to raise awareness of community issues and the role they can play in bringing about change.

"I was interested in getting more involved in UJA and awakening the spirit of young Jews who have just finished with their first degree," said Josh Shuval, a 25 year old accountant and volunteer in a new UJA Federation division called Seamless Next Generation. "I have been participating in UJA events for younger people and I realized that there was a real need for a Seamless division that engages university grads. It seems that after university those who were active in Hillel or other organizations lose track and drop off. With Seamless we hope to raise awareness in the next generation, it's a real investment in the community and very worthwhile."

Abbie Solish and Jennifer Schachter, both newly out of university, attended the event and the Seamless reception as a way to reconnect with their community and find out more about Seamless and what it means.

"I'm really excited about the turnout," Schachter said. "It's great to see so many people my age coming out and getting involved."

Eric and Karen Green, along with Mitchel Radowitz, all in their early 30s, attended the Ben Gurion Society reception. The Society is a UJA Federation division for young adults between 25 and 40 who contribute a minimum of $1,000 to the UJA Federation campaign. They were thoughtful about their contribution to Campaign 2006 and Toronto's Jewish community.

"Our generation was fortunate enough to have grown up in relative affluence compared to the last one," Eric Green said. "The last generation set the bar high and now we're at a stage where we need to give back. It's important to carry on."

"We need to think about what happens next," Radowitz added. "There are many Jewish young people out there who are lost and need direction. It's our turn now to become the next leaders. I think we're up to the task."

Jewish Federations lend their support to Hurricane Katrina victims

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

The UJA Federation Hurricane Katrina Disaster Relief Fund, established two weeks ago in conjunction with United Jewish Communities (UJC), has already raised more than $200,000, toward a UJC total of $4.3 million.

All contributions are being directed to UJC, which represents more than 500 Jewish communities across North America.

One hundred percent of funds raised will then go to the relief, rescue, and long-term needs of evacuees and affected communities. The money will cover needs such as food and basic supplies, financial aid, mental-health counseling, temporary housing, respite care for thousands of evacuees and health care not covered by insurance.

"We as Jews, all share the responsibility of helping others in need," says UJA Federation Board Chair, David Engel. "As we displayed by coming together to help those affected by the recent tsunami in Southeast Asia, we all share the basic value of tikun olam, repairing the world. Once again, as the numbers indicate, Toronto's wonderful and compassionate Jewish community is again stepping up to the plate for people who need our help."

One man who is doing everything he can to help is Rabbi Nemes, director of Chabad of Metairie - just minutes from New Orleans. The rabbi decided to ride out the hurricane in his partially flooded home. After he was contacted by a few people that were also stuck in the city and were afraid to take shelter in the Superdome, the rabbi and his family invited them into his own home for the duration of the storm.

Approximately 12,000 Jews escaped the ravages of Katrina by making their way to Houston. In fact, the Jewish Federation of New Orleans has been temporarily relocated there.

One of those currently waiting things out in Houston is 24-year-old Aron Cohen, who was born in the city but moved to the New Orleans area just under a year ago to pursue his career in the restaurant business.

As reports of Hurricane Katrina's impending arrival became known, Cohen grabbed what he could from his apartment in River Ridge, ten minutes from New Orleans, loaded his car, and started to drive to Houston to join his family.

"I put my furniture up on cinder blocks, grabbed what I could - like photos, my diploma, and whatever water and munchies I could find, and just took off around midnight," says Cohen.

Hurricane Katrina hit the New Orleans area early the next morning.

"The authorities changed all of the incoming lanes into outgoing lanes, heading away from town to Houston. Unfortunately, the signage got messed up so it was pretty tough to really know where I was headed. I just kept driving."

The drive from Cohen's home to Houston would normally take five hours. However, on this particular night, amidst panic and chaos, it took more than 11 hours. Cohen arrived safely at his family's Houston home at 10:00 a.m. Sunday morning, only a couple of hours after Katrina touched down in New Orleans.

"From what I've been told, I understand my apartment's all right - at least for now," he says. "Really though, none of the material things mean that much to me. The whole scenario in New Orleans is so disturbing; almost unbelievable really. It's right out of a disaster movie. People were hijacking cars with guns, others were looting. It's one thing if they're stealing food and water, but quite another when its television sets and running shoes. Right now it's just not safe there - and it's not sane there either. I just pray that everybody will be okay. I'm very fortunate to be here, with my family in Houston."

Aron Cohen

"It's beyond horrible and sad, and impossible to comprehend," said Julie Wise Oreck, who has relocated with her family from New Orleans to Houston where she has been in various leadership roles in the Jewish community for years.

"Each day I wake up and think what can I do today to be productive in making our life as settled and okay here in Houston as possible," she says. "The local Jewish Federations have been amazing, incredible, beyond supportive. There are crisis teams that can find you anything you need. The Jewish Federation of New Orleans is trying to compile a data base of where we all are."

To make a contribution to the UJA Federation Hurricane Katrina Disaster Relief Fund, please visit www.jewishtoronto.com or call the UJA Federation Hotline at 416.631.5700.

Anita Ekstein named MOL 2006 chair

Long time UJA Federation volunteer, Holocaust survivor and passionate Holocaust educator, Anita Ekstein has been named the national chair of the 2006 March of the Living (MOL). The March of the Living is an international initiative sponsored in Toronto by UJA Federation and nationally by UIA Federations Canada which sees students from around the world walk the three kilometers that separate Auschwitz from Birkenau. Having devoted the last 14 years of her life to educating young people about the evils of antisemitism, racism and bigotry and a participant on the March of the Living five times over, Ekstein is the first Holocaust survivor to hold the position. Hidden by Polish gentiles during the war she is determined in her new role to encourage a stronger relationship with Polish Jewish youth.

Anita Ekstein

"I am very interested in improving relations with Polish Jewry," said Ekstein. "I want to ensure a greater understating of the legacy we have in Poland and what happened there during the war. We should not miss the opportunity while we are in Poland for the March to forge a stronger relationship with the Jewish youth there, it is a wonderful chance to further the education process and should not be missed."

McGuinty says he'll ban all religious arbitration

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty's announcement Sunday that he would move to ban all religious arbitration "as soon as possible" was met with concern by members of the Jewish community.

McGuinty's statement followed the release of a report last December by former NDP attorney general Marion Boyd that recommended the continued use of arbitration, including faith-based arbitration, under Ontario's Arbitration Act as long as "safeguards" are observed.

Since 1991, the act has upheld the decisions of arbitrators – faith-based and others – as long as certain conditions are met, explained Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, secretary of the beit din of Toronto's Va'ad Harabonim.

Boyd's report was commissioned to address issues raised about the use of Muslim personal law – commonly referred to as sharia – in arbitrations after concerns were expressed about women's rights. The report included 46 recommendations that involved the overseeing of arbitrators and emphasized the importance of balancing individual and minority group rights.

The government has been studying the matter of sharia law, and McGuinty said Sunday he felt the debate had gone on long enough, a representative of his office told The CJN.

In an interview with Canadian Press, the premier said religious arbitrations "threaten our common ground."

Ontarians "will always have the right to seek advice from anyone in matters of family law, including religious advice. But no longer will religious arbitration be deciding matters of family law," McGuinty was quoted as saying.

"There will be no sharia law in Ontario. There will be no religious arbitration in Ontario. There will be one law for all Ontarians," he said.

"We're obviously very disappointed with what has been reported," said Len Rudner, national director of communications for Canadian Jewish Congress. Faith-based arbitration has served the Jewish community, and other communities, "very well for many years," Rudner said. "We have every intention of pursuing this matter."

Rabbi Tradburks said the difficulties involved in recognizing sharia law "are real difficulties, but the solution is not necessarily to throw out all faith-based arbitration."

Toronto's beit din receives about 75 inquiries a year and, of those, hears about 25 cases. Most, said Rabbi Tradburks, are commercial cases involving issues such as employee-employer relations. For a religious Jew, it is a mitzvah (God-given law) to settle such issues in a religious court, he explained.

In addition to the religious obligation, the rabbi said, advantages of the beit din include settling matters more quickly and less expensively when courts are backlogged.

Jewish divorces are dealt with by a separate beit din, the Beth Din Zedek of Toronto. Spokesperson Rabbi Mordechai Ochs said it deals with about 150 get (Jewish divorce) cases a year, but it does not deal with financial matters such as the division of assets, which are handled by civil courts.

Penny Krowitz, executive director of Jewish Women International, said she was "very concerned" about McGuinty's announcement. "We respect the need for religious divorce in any religion. My understanding is that that will be maintained."

She added that there should also be respect by religious groups for civil law, especially regarding family issues such as custody and distribution of assets. "The laws of the province or the country should be the laws by which we all abide."

Two JWI members who are also leaders of the Canadian Coalition of Jewish Women for the Get, Norma Joseph and Evelyn Brook, met with Boyd when she was working on her report, Krowitz said.

Montreal girds for messianic drive

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Jews for Jesus plans to open a branch in Montreal as part of "Behold Your God," its international missionary campaign to convert Jews to Christianity that starts here Sept. 18 and runs for three weeks.

The missionary group's website says the new outpost will be led by Karl deSouza from its Toronto office.

"Karl will be leading the [Montreal] branch, and we hope that through the campaign, friendships with many Christians and contract with many Jewish seekers will get off to a running start," the site says.

Jews for Jesus says deSouza was born in Karachi, Pakistan, and that his mother is "from the Bene-Israel Jewish community in India." It says "he came to know Jesus as his Messiah" in his senior year at Concordia University and that his parents have also "come to faith."

The group's five-year "Behold Your God" drive, launched in 2001, targets 65 cities around the world (outside Israel) with Jewish populations greater than 25,000. It has reached 40 so far.

In Canada, that has included a 2003 stop in Toronto, where Jews for Jesus claims to have reached 10 Jews "who trusted in Y'shua" – Jesus' Hebrew name – and several other dozen "who were willing to be followed up on," said Rabbi Michael Skobac, education director of Jews for Judaism.

The Toronto-based counter-missionary group has been working closely with Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q), FEDERATION CJA and local synagogues to mount an all-out counter-campaign to run concurrently with the conversion effort.

Rebecca Rosenberg, CJC-Q's associate director, said the main goal is "to reach as many Jews as possible in order to let them know [Jews for Jesus] is coming and to know what to expect."

Jews for Judaism believes Jews for Jesus and other such groups use deception to convert Jews, telling them that if they accept Jesus, they can still be "fulfilled" or "committed" Jews. Jews for Judaism also opposes the missionary group's selective targeting of Jews.

The counter-campaign's "launching pad," Rabbi Skobac said, will be a full weekend of activities called "Stand Up for Judaism," to be held at the Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation. Slated events include a Sept. 19 "town hall meeting" with Rabbi Skobac and an all-day "counter-missionary survival seminar" on Sept. 18.

The counter-campaign also features an eight-page insert in The CJN – an abridged version of of a book by Jews for Judaism founder Rabbi Bentzion Kravitz, The Jewish Response to Missionaries.

Jews for Judaism is recruiting dozens of volunteers to "counter-leaflet" missionaries at high-traffic street-corners over the three-week period.

Julius Ciss, Jews for Judaism's Toronto director, said that while Montreal Jews are probably less likely to be swayed by missionaries than Jews in other communities due to their strong "traditional" habits, the threat from Jews for Jesus still remains.

He said that although Jews for Jesus has never established a permanent presence in Montreal, several "messianic synagogues" have been operating in the city for years.

On its website, Jews for Jesus describes Montreal as a city where "[h]edonism, relativism and secularism are rampant" and as one "that needs the Gospel."

It says that in Montreal, "most Jews have never heard the Gospel in terms they can understand and are perishing without Messiah!"

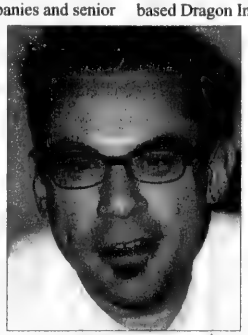
Whiz-kid entrepreneur grew up in poverty

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — He's published two books, both of which have been on the bestseller list. He's a director of three companies and senior adviser to several others. He's an adviser to the Canadian ministry of international trade and has a network of contacts around the globe. And at 34, he's just getting started.

This is Leonard Brody, an entrepreneur who brims with ideas and enthusiasm, quickly revealing his passionate embrace of Judaism and Israel, and the business acumen that has branded him a leader, mover and shaker in virtually every enterprise he touches.



Leonard Brody

Brody was part of the Canadian management team when Onvia.com completed a $240 million (US) initial public offering on NASDAQ, one of the largest Internet IPOs in history. After assisting in quadrupling Onvia's revenue, he spearheaded its sale to Bell Actimedia before moving on to his next entrepreneurial venture.

Today, Brody's is an advisor and director to more than 10 companies, both private and public, among them Infowave, Sonic Foundry, TransGaming, and the United Kingdom-based Derby County Football Club. He's also an adviser and venture partner to venture capital funds worldwide, among them Vancouver-based GrowthWorks, the U.K.-based Create Partners, Dallas-based Mobility Ventures and Taiwan-based Dragon Investments.

Brody grew up in Calgary and recalls working from the age of 11, doing anything he could, be it digging holes or selling shoes. His work was borne of necessity, for there were many times his family lived below the poverty line. "But growing up humble and poor was the best thing that happened to me," he says.

"I think having money can often breed lethargy. A lot of guys I know that grew up with money were sucked into the family business and are unhappy today. They didn't have the hunger of those who had been denied things. I wear my past proudly on my sleeve. It was a difficult time then, but it got me where I am today."

When he finished high school, Brody decided to become an entertainment lawyer. He entered Osgoode Law School at Toronto's York University in 1994, spending his summer vacations working at the Toronto law firm Heenan Blakie. He also engaged in business start-up ventures and began thinking hard about his future.

"I realized I didn't like a business without true assets," he says. "I said goodbye to law in 1999, which means I actually practised for 38 minutes, if you count my walk out the door." But Brody is grateful for the training he received in law school. "It was good preparation for business, and it tends to command respect from other people."

As he considered his future, he looked for a mentor. He turned to a relative whose name most Canadians would recognize: the late media magnate Izzy Asper. "Izzy was a phenomenal human being – so devoted to his principles. I learned a lot from him from afar, and from the letters we exchanged," Brody says.

Asper believed Brody had the spark of successful entrepreneurship inside him and encouraged him at every opportunity. "Izzy believed that I had it in me, and his blessing meant a lot to me," Brody says.

Over the next few years, Brody would move from one high-tech company to the next, focusing on gaming at his start-up Iprio and on content management at Marqui. At the same time, he decided to share his thoughts with a wider audience.

"I wrote my first book, Innovation Nation (Wiley) in 2003, and it became a bestseller," he says. The book argued that for its size, Canada was the greatest technology producer in the world. In June 2005, he released his second book, Everything I Needed to Know about Business I Learned from a Canadian (Wiley).

Luckily for the Jews as a nation, Brody expends a lot of time on Israel and Jewish issues. On the regional board of the Canada-Israel Committee, he is spearheading a November mission to Israel, with the goal of getting more Israeli companies listed on Canadian stock exchanges.

"We're bringing heads of the Toronto Venture Exchange, investment bankers and lawyers to Israel to meet with government officials and business leaders," he says. "We hope to create a formal partnership with the Tel Aviv exchange. The idea is that the deeper Canada's economic ties to Israel, the less Israel becomes just another political relationship to Canada."

Locally, in his now-hometown of Vancouver, Brody is toying with a new way to involve young entrepreneurs in Jewish charitable structures. "A lot of young entrepreneurs don't like just handing money over to [the] federation – they want to be more involved," he says.

His goal is to gather Jewish entrepreneurs and with their assistance, put together a venture capital fund that would be invested exclusively in for-profit and not-for-profit projects for the development of the Jewish community. "Ultimately, this will be national, with different chapters in different cities," he says.

As he looks to the future, his hopes are to connect more with the spiritual side of religion, and to spend more time with friends, enjoying life. "I have horrible attention deficit disorder," he confesses. "I find I always have to be connected with my work."

Intermarrieds buried in Sask. cemetery

By BRAM EISENTHAL
JTA

REGINA — On a patch of green land, a wrought-iron gate stands at the entrance to a new cemetery, the words "Dedicated to the partnership of love and faith" inscribed on its doorway.

The Cemeteries, as the burial ground in Saskatchewan's capital is known, is the brainchild of Noel Sandomirsky, a a judge of the Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench who is a lifelong member of the 100-year-old Beth Jacob Synagogue and the chairman of its chevrah kadishah, or burial society.

What sets the two-month-old burial ground apart is its purpose: The Cemeteries is meant for Jews wishing to be buried next to their non-Jewish spouses, something not ordinarily allowed under Jewish law.

Sandomirsky, 63, is married to a convert. In addition, Beth Jacob's spiritual leader of eight years, the yet-to-be-ordained Jeremy Parnes, has a non-Jewish partner. In fact, most of the 700 Jews remaining in the once-thriving Regina community – roughly 400 of whom belong to the unaffiliated but largely Conservative-style Beth Jacob – are tolerant of interfaith relationships.

Sandomirsky recalls a vibrant, healthy Jewish population in the Regina of his youth – many young Jews met and married through the B'nai Brith Youth Organization. Now, however, there are only about 15 children in the community who will attend Beth Jacob's Hebrew school this year.

"I realized some time ago that the sphere of assimilation and how we deal with that historically involved religions that tend to excommunicate those who fall in love outside their faith," Sandomirsky says.

"That's a high price to pay for falling in love. We should encourage these people to stay within the faith, creating a counterbalance to assimilation and the danger of losing people."

Sandomirsky decided to apply this concept to death as well. He looked into halachah, or Jewish religious law, and sought out the possibilities for such an arrangement. The Cemeteries is the result.

Separated from other Jewish burial grounds on the property by greenery, trees, shrubs and a large entrance gate, the Cemeteries comprises 42 plots in three rows of 14 each, enough to last the community for quite some time.

The odd-numbered grave sites are reserved for Jewish members of the synagogue, the even-numbered ones for non-Jews. Between each of the rows is a steel post laid into a cement block. A small, stainless-steel link chain is inserted between each post, creating an 18-inch-high barrier.

That's not too high to impede visitors wishing to pay their respects to a deceased couple, but it does create the barrier required by Jewish law, Sandomirsky says.

To the judge in him, it appears to be a fair and appropriate solution.

"After a lifetime together, the couple should have the privilege – indeed, the right – of being buried side by side," Sandomirsky says.

Rabbi Alan Bright, spiritual leader of Congregation Shaare Zedek, a Conservative shul in Montreal, said the concept sounds acceptable to him.

"I have no problem with the theory, as long as there is a barrier, and it does not have to obscure the view," Rabbi Bright says.

"As long as there is a barrier, burying a Jew next to a non-Jew is permissible according to halachah."

In small European Jewish communities, he says, the situation of Jews being buried in close proximity to non-Jews arose all the time. In the Montreal suburb of Beaconsfield, he notes, "we have a row of trees that acts as a natural barrier between the Jewish and non-Jewish portions of the cemetery."

THE FRIENDS YOU MAKE WILL LAST A LIFETIME

Police chief hopes to establish good ties with city's mosques

He added that he hopes he will be able to establish a good relationship with members of the growing number of mosques in the city, similar to the one he has with members of Toronto synagogues.

"The relationship between police and the Jewish community in Toronto and in the synagogues is one that is long established and very mutually respectful, and there is very good co-operation. We are very committed to continuing that relationship," the chief said.

Blair said despite the force's best efforts, it's been "a very, very challenging summer" due to hate-motivated crimes, homicides and gang violence

But he said Toronto is still a safe place to live.

Blair committed to continuing relationship with synagogues

"This may sound a little trite – and it's difficult when you hear about a four-year-old child that was shot – to tell people that this is one of the safest cities in the world, but Toronto is one of the safest cities in the world," Blair said defiantly.

He added that Toronto has North America's fourth largest municipal police service, and that compared to New York and Los Angeles, our crime rates are "absurdly low."

But he said this summer's transit bombings in London are a reminder that the threat of terrorism is no longer a foreign problem, and that Torontonians must be on the lookout for suspicious behaviour, and not members of particular groups, in order to thwart potential attacks.

"The threat of terrorism has changed significantly in this city since 9/11. It used to be that we would say the threat is coming from without, that it is coming from somewhere else."

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, challenged Blair on whether Toronto police have learned from mistakes in London, and he asked the chief about what's being done to learn about the activities of Islamic fundamentalists in local mosques.

Blair answered that police are doing everything they can to develop a relationship with Muslims through community outreach programs.

He said he hopes that if police build a foundation of trust with moderate Muslims, they may be able to work with police to help diminish the threat of terrorism by extremists.

Blair said he is confident community outreach programs, coupled with a unit in his police force that is "engaged in intelligence gathering," will help prevent terror attacks and decrease the number of hate crimes in Toronto.

Cemetery idea proving popular

Sandomirsky says that some older and more traditional members of the Regina community objected when the idea was first proposed, but their concerns were assuaged through dialogue.

"When the rubber hit the pavement this past summer, there was no opposition at all," he says.

So far, the idea is proving popular.

"We've already had three couples purchase plots in the first two months of operation. And I've also had inquiries from Saskatoon, Moose Jaw, Jeremy," all in Saskatchewan, as well as Winnipeg, Sandomirsky says.

He adds that he's not aware of similar arrangements elsewhere.

"I have visited a number of cemeteries over the years, and I have never come upon anything like this," Sandomirsky says. "I didn't base the idea on an existing place" – just on the idea of eternal love.

השָׁכל שברגליים

עם השנים פיתחתי את התיאוריה הבאה לגבי המוזכיזם הישראלי לכדורגל:

אהבתם של הישראלים לכדורגל משולה לאהבתם של הורים לילד שהוא, אין נגיד, קצת מוגבל שכלית. חשוב לאהוב אותו, אבל ברגע שמצפים שהוא ילמד מדעים באוניברסיטה (יענו גביע העולם בכדורגל) מצפה אכזבה, ומתחילים להעליב את הילד על לא עוול בכפו ולצעוק על המנהל והמורה.

אז לנו האוהדים נשאר לב שבור של חול ואבן, או שסוף סוף נעבור לספורט הנכון. אבל שישאר בינינו.

לפני מספר שנים היכה האמן עידן רייכל בתדהמה את הזירה הישראלית, כשיצר את "הפרוייקט של עידן רייכל" שהושתת כולו על המוזיקה והחוויה של עולי אתיופיה.

עכשיו בא תקליט ההמשך "ממעמקים". יצירות המשך הן מאוד בעייתיות ליוצריהן, כי קשה מאוד להדהים שוב ולא לחזור על עצמך. לדעתי "ממעמקים" יותר יפה ומפתיע מקודמו. המוסיקה נהדרת, הטקסטים נוגעים ללב, העיבודים בָּרמה הבינלאומית הגבוהה ביותר. והפעם הדחיב רייכל את הזירעה ונתן כבוד גם למוסיקה ולתרבות התימנית. וכמו היהלום שבכתר-הביא את המלכה בכבודה ובעצמה לשיר שני שירים. כן, ניחשתם אגלי-שושנה דמארי.

רייכל, יד על הלב, עושה במוסיקה האתנית שלו למיזוג הגלויות ולהבנה בין שבטית יותר ממאה פוליטיקאים. וזה שהוא משתמש בחומרים טבעיים של יהודי אתיופיה ותימן מוסיף לדברים את האיכות של דבוז'ק שהכניס שירי עם לסימפונית "מן העולם החדש".

זהו תקליט חובה לכל מי שאיכפת לו מישראל, שלא לדבר על כל מי שרוצה להנות ממש. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Alberta delegation forges new ties with Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The governments of Alberta and Israel have taken a "first step" toward developing a relationship that would see co-operation in the areas of irrigation, security and high tech, Alberta's Minister of Infrastructure and Transportation Lyle Oberg said en route to the Jewish state.

Speaking by telephone from Kiev, Ukraine, Oberg said "there is a huge opportunity to move ahead in all areas."

Israel is known for its expertise in irrigation as well as for its advanced security measures. The Alberta delegation will explore ways of adapting Israeli know-how to the Canadian market, he said.

Oberg recently led a delegation of 20 Alberta business people, academics and researchers to Israel for a one week visit. Rami Kleinmann, the emissary of the Jewish National Fund (JNF) to the prairies, as well as Canadian businessman Nathan Jacobson, accompanied the group. They stopped for two days in Ukraine, where the minister signed a memorandum of understanding with his Ukrainian counterpart on sharing information on road construction.

During the group's visit in Ukraine, yeshiva student Mordekhai Molozhenov was severely beaten by a skinhead gang. The youth was later transported to Israel where a private donor has funded brain surgery at Ichilov Hospital.

Oberg said "those kinds of incidents are a shock to everyone," but he was encouraged by the response of Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko who personally wrote to the chief rabbi of Kiev condemning the assault and promising to get to the bottom of it.

While in Ukraine, Oberg visited Babi Yar, the site outside Kiev where Nazi forces murdered the city's Jewish population during World War II, Jacobson said.

The minister also met with representatives of the Ukrainian Jewish Congress and with Evgen Chervonienko, Ukraine's transport minister who, like Jacobson, is also a member of the congress.

Looking ahead to the Israeli leg of the trip, Oberg said researchers from the University of Lethbridge and the Alberta Irrigation Projects Association are eager to view Israeli irrigation and water infrastructure first hand and learn how they address issues of salinity. The visit could also benefit Israeli scientists, who can use Alberta to scale up the size of their projects, he said.

On the security front, Alberta is concerned about disruption to oil sands production and ensuring a "safe stable supply to the United States."

"One event could shut down the oil sands for years," he said. "Israel has expertise in protecting manufacturing and mining complexes and pipelines."

One item of technology the Alberta delegation is eager to assess is an auditory cable that is placed above a pipeline to monitor whether someone is digging down, he said.

Oberg said the idea for a mission to Israel originated in a dinner meeting about four months ago with Kleinmann. They were sharing thoughts about the expertise of Israelis and Albertans and it occurred to them a "synergy" could be created, he said.

The JNF and the province of Alberta each contributed $1 million to fund research project to determine best practices and exchange information on water conservation and irrigation issues. Last week's mission will help decide which projects may be undertaken under the agreement.

According to data provided by the Province of Alberta, trade between the two jurisdictions grew rapidly in 2004. Exports to Israel reached $35.6 million last year, up from $6.3 million the year before. Electrical equipment was the largest single component of Alberta wares sold in Israel, followed by telecommunications equipment and polyethylene.

Israeli exports to Alberta in 2004 reached $67 million, including diamonds, pharmaceuticals and telecommunications equipment.

Other highlights of the business relationship includes a joint venture involving OPTI, a unit of Israel's Ormat Industries, and Nexen Inc., which agreed in August 2003 to develop a $3 billion oil sands project at Long Lake, near Fort McMurray, beginning in 2007.

On the academic front, the University of Alberta maintains relations with several Israeli universities while the University of Calgary has ties with the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

Montreal shul to give away 200 High Holy Day tickets

JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Congregation Shomrim Laboker is giving away up to 200 seats for the High Holy Days to attract Jews who would otherwise not attend services.

The tickets – 100 in the men's section and 100 in the women's section – are being offered on a first-come, first-served basis, with no question asked and no strings attached.

Rabbi Yonah Rosner said the intention is to reach those who can't afford to buy a seat or who would otherwise not attend services because they are, for example, unaffiliated or from out-of-town.

The tickets are good for the two days of Rosh Hashanah and for Yom Kippur. They are for the main service in the shul's sanctuary, which holds about 650 people. If demand is great enough, a wall can be removed to accommodate another 150.

The congregation is modern Orthodox and boasts a new cantor from Israel, Israel Erzon, and a new choir.

Rabbi Rosner admits the congregation's membership, like those of other synagogues in the Snowdon area, is not what it used to be, and said it's unlikely all the seats would otherwise be full. The seats normally go for between about $50 and $200, he said.

"It's the first time I'm aware of a Montreal synagogue doing this," he said.

Non-Jew named CJC's regional director for Quebec

For the first time in its history, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has a non-Jewish regional director in Quebec.

Joachim Normand, a francophone native of Quebec City who was chief of staff to former federal cabinet minister Martin Cauchon, is a lawyer by profession. Normand was in private practice in Montreal for more than 20 years and taught at the Quebec Bar. He worked for Cauchon while he was justice and national revenue minister.

His wife, Leila Heller Normand, is Jewish, as is his daughter. Mrs. Normand is the honorary consul-general of Ghana for Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, a position her husband held before becoming a political adviser to Cauchon.

Jeffrey Boro, CJC's Quebec region president, said that Normand "brings to this position a wealth of experience and knowledge which will certainly serve him and CJC-QR well."

"We had a rigorous selection process which resulted in the best man for the job. I am confident that he will prove to be an excellent complement to our professional team, uniquely poised to provide leadership and guidance to the organization on issues of public policy and human rights."

Normand said he hopes to able to put to use his knowledge of Quebec society and of the Jewish community, as well as his skills of rapprochement.

"As honorary consul-general for Ghana in Montreal, I was able to build bridges between that country and Canada. Working with [Cauchon], I was fortunate to play a role in advancing meaningful legislation to the benefit of Quebeckers and Canadians.

"Now I look forward to the opportunity to work with the Jewish community on issues which are of concern to its members, concerns that I know are shared by all Quebeckers."

Klein visited Israel in '95

Government to government contacts are not unprecedented In September 1997, the Israeli ambassador visited Alberta, while in June 1995, Premier Ralph Klein led a 29-member delegation of Alberta companies on a trade and investment mission to Israel. In October 1998, Shirley McClellan, the minister of community development, visited Israel to discuss co-operation in volunteerism.

Oberg suggested there was a natural fit between Albertans and the people of Israel. "The spirit of the Israeli people is similar to the spirit of the Alberta people," he said. "Both are on the cutting edge of what's happening and they [possess] a frontier spirit."

Editorial

As this particularly hot summer draws to a close, Jews everywhere are beginning to anticipate the High Holy Days, which begin with Rosh Hashanah on the first two days of Tishrei and culminate with Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah.

Upcoming is a month of introspection as we take stock of our past year and repent for our sins, and of joy as we look forward to starting the new year with a clean slate.

We also look forward, of course, to the gathering together of family and friends, and festive meals with lavishly laid out tables, holiday foods and traditional offerings such as pomegranates, apples and honey and round challahs.

Many cooks endeavour to incorporate these traditional foods into their holiday meals, and in our food stories this year, we are offering recipes for such favourites as apple challah, green salad and pomegranates, and honeyed green beans.

Others prepare foods traditional to their culture or dishes that have graced their family's tables for many years. Chicken soup and knaidlach, lockshen kugel and roast chicken or turkey are never out of place at a festival meal.

For the most part, cooks, both experienced and novice, spend hours comparing menus, sharing recipes, poring over old recipes and cookbooks and putting together shopping lists. This is often a highlight of the coming holidays, but for some, preparing a festive meal can be a daunting task.

We've tried to take some of the stress out of the holiday meal by offering recipes that run the gamut of traditional, such as meat tzimmes; ethnic, such as Moroccan cinnamon chicken; or simple yet elegant, such as classic poached salmon.

However you choose to entertain this holiday season, we're sure to have something in our upcoming food supplements to help you out.

From all of us at The CJN, we wish you happy cooking and, most of all, a shanah tovah.

Jazz up Rosh Hashanah dinner with both traditional and nouveau dishes

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special the CJN

If you're like me, you love all the traditional trimmings of the holidays but also crave something a little unexpected on the dining table every year.

During the High Holy Days, I serve many dishes that my family has come to enjoy and expect, but also endeavour to make a few new ones that jazz up my taste buds and consequent enjoyment.

Moroccan cinnamon chicken is perfect for Rosh Hashanah, not only because it contains that perennial favourite, chicken, but also because it uses the traditional element of honey, in a whole different guise. The sweetness of the honey is tempered by the heat of the ginger root and the bite of the garlic, and smoothed out by the presence of cinnamon. The sprinkling of sesame seeds on top adds a welcome crunch.

Although fennel, once cooked, becomes sweet and sublime, the wine in which it is braised adds a distracting note. The same is true of the slightly bitter frisee salad. A home-baked pear and applesauce offers a low-fat dessert, with promises of a rich and sweet new year.

MOROCCAN CINNAMON CHICKEN

1 1/4 cups honey
1/4 cup freshly squeezed lemon juice
2 tbsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. grated fresh ginger root
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 tbsp. cinnamon
1 1/2 tsp. each ground cumin and coriander
1/2 tsp. each salt and pepper
7 lb. chicken pieces
2 tbsp. toasted sesame seeds

In large bowl, whisk together honey, lemon juice, olive oil, ginger root, garlic, cinnamon, cumin, coriander, salt and pepper. Add chicken pieces to marinade, turning until all pieces are well coated. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 12 or up to 24 hours, turning chicken occasionally.

Place chicken on foil-lined rimmed baking sheet. Place remaining marinade in saucepan; bring to boil. Boil gently for about 20 minutes or until reduced by 2/3 and syrupy. Brush all over chicken.

Bake in centre of preheated 375 oven for about 40 minutes or until chicken is no longer pink inside. Broil for 1 to 2 minutes to brown if desired.

Remove chicken to large platter. Sprinkle with sesame seeds and garnish platter with lemon slices or wedges. Makes 10-12 servings.

Pineapple chicken piccata as seen in kosher by design Entertains by Susie Fishbein, Mesorah publishers

WINE BRAISED FENNEL

3 large fennel bulbs
1/2 cup dry white wine
1/4 tsp. saffron threads
2 tbsp. olive oil
1/2 tsp. each salt and pepper
1 cup chicken broth

Reserving a few fronds, trim stalks and fronds from fennel; cut in half and then each half into thirds.

Stir together white wine and saffron and set aside.

Heat oil in large skillet set over medium-high heat. In batches, brown fennel pieces on all sides, sprinkling with salt and pepper. Remove to platter.

Pour white wine mixture into skillet; cook, stirring up any browned bits, for about 5 minutes or until reduced by half. Pour in chicken stock. Bring to boil. Fit fennel pieces into skillet in single layer. Reduce heat and simmer, covered, for about 40 minutes or until fennel is very tender.

Arrange fennel on platter. Boil any liquid remaining in pan briefly, about 5 minutes, or until syrupy. Pour over fennel. Garnish with reserved fennel fronds. Makes 10 servings.

FRISEE SALAD WITH ORANGES AND POMEGRANATES

1 cup pomegranate seeds or shelled toasted pistachios
1 large head frisee lettuce, torn into bite size pieces (about 12 cups)
3 cups torn Boston or Romaine lettuce
3 navel or blood oranges, cut into segments and patted dry

Dressing:
2 tbsp. sherry vinegar
2 tbsp. minced red onion
1 tsp. finely grated orange rind
2 tbsp. fresh orange juice
1 tbsp. dijon mustard
2 tsp. honey
1/4 tsp. salt and pepper
1/3 cup extra virgin olive oil

Make dressing: in small bowl or 2-cup liquid measure, whisk together vinegar, red onion, orange rind and juice, mustard, honey, salt and pepper. Gradually whisk in olive oil until emulsified; set aside.

Wash and pat dry both lettuces. Combine lettuces with orange segments in salad bowl. Drizzle two-thirds of dressing over lettuce and toss until well coated, adding more vinaigrette to fully coat. Sprinkle pomegranate seeds over. Makes 10 servings.

Easy solutions for a holiday dinner

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

I was thinking recently about the upcoming holidays and especially about Rosh Hashanah.

My oldest child, Devorah, was born on the first day of Rosh Hashanah and this year her English birthday coincides with her Hebrew birthday. I remember how exciting it was; the beginning of a new year, a new life and a new family.

In this period before the holidays, when we Jews search our souls and contemplate our lives – and before getting bogged down in menu planning and the logistics of the holiday – I thought about how it is a new beginning once again for many things. In many ways, Rosh Hashanah, ancient as it is, reflects many things about our modern life. We celebrate the New Year just as a school year has just begun for our children (and teachers), our shiurim, classes and committees reconvene, after-school activities begin, and we return to our busy schedules after the lazy summer.

But reality strikes, and along with the soul-searching comes the planning. Do the children have shoes to wear for the holidays? Does anyone need new outfits? Who shall we invite for the meals? And, of course, what shall I cook?

HOLIDAY SOUP

This recipe came from my South African friend Heather Maresky and is probably my all-time favourite soup. I, personally, would be content with a Shabbat or holiday meal consisting of a few helpings of this soup and challah. My guests often ask for second helpings of it, in spite of a big meal to come.

You can use any vegetables you prefer. The soup will be somewhat thick. This is not an exact recipe. If you like a thinner soup, add more water when you add the chicken. Matzah balls or kreplach are delicious in the soup also. I often use turkey necks in place of chicken and add soup meat. Yum! In the wintertime, this is a meal in itself.

1 lb. pumpkin or butternut squash
3 zucchini
3 large potatoes
3 large onions
6-8 carrots
2 ribs celery
3 large cloves garlic
salt and pepper to taste
12 cups water
2 lb. chicken pieces or necks
2 lb. beef marrow bones
4 tbsp. chopped fresh dill

Put vegetables and water into a large soup pot, and bring to a boil. Cover and cook over low heat for about 45 minutes, or until vegetables are tender. Purée soup in a blender or with a stick blender and return to pot. Add chicken and marrow bones and cook for 1½ hours longer. Add chopped fresh dill. Makes about 12 servings.

TRADITIONAL MEAT TZIMMES

Whenever I eat tzimmes, I think of my grandmother, who always made this dish for holidays. This is not her recipe, since she did not cook with recipes, but it is very similar to hers. This can be prepared ahead and reheated, covered, over low heat. It can also be prepared in a slow cooker. When stirring this dish, do so carefully, preferably with a wooden spoon.

HONEY PEAR AND APPLESAUCE

7 ripe pears
4 apples (Royal Gala or McIntosh)
3 strips lemon peel
2 cloves
¼ cup honey

Peel, core and cut pears and apples into large chunks. Place in large saucepan along with ½ cup water, lemon peel and cloves. Place over medium-high heat and bring to boil. Reduce heat, cover and simmer, stirring occasionally, for 20 or 30 minutes or until fruit is very tender.

Remove peel and cloves from saucepan. Using food processor or potato masher, puree apples until saucelike. Stir in honey. (Sauce can be covered and refrigerated for up to 5 days). Makes about 5 cups, 10-12 servings.

A tableful of tasty main and side dishes

2 tbsp. oil
2 lb. stew meat
2 large onions, cut into large chunks
4 carrots, cut into large chunks
4 cups or more water
1½ pounds sweet potatoes, cut into large chunks
⅓ cup honey
8 oz. pitted prunes
salt and pepper to taste
1 tbsp. flour or instant mashed potaotes

Brown meat in oil in a large Dutch oven over medium heat. Add onions and sauté until browned. Add carrots and water to cover. Bring to a boil, cover and simmer over low heat for 1 hour. Add sweet potatoes, honey, prunes and salt and pepper. Cook uncovered for about 30 minutes more or until meat is tender, stirring occasionally.

Mix flour with 2 tbsp. cold water and add to tzimmes. If using instant mashed potatoes, simply add to tzimmes and stir in. Makes about 6 servings.

TZIBBELE KUGEL

In my family, the only kugels that were served were savoury, or non-sweet kugels made with salt, pepper and onions. I never tasted a sweet kugel until after I was married and was amazed that people actually ate such things. If you have a cast-iron frying pan, use it for this kugel.

5-6 tbsp. oil
2-3 large onions, diced
16 oz. fresh mushrooms, sliced, optional
16 oz. medium noodles
salt and pepper to taste
4 eggs, beaten

Preheat oven to 400. Heat oil in a heavy frying pan and sauté onions over medium heat until light brown (about 15 minutes). If using mushrooms, add now and sauté until both onions and mushrooms are well browned (about 5 minutes).

Cook noodles according to manufacturer's directions until done but not too soft. Drain, and rinse in cold water. Place in a large bowl and add onion/mushroom mixture. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Add eggs and mix well. Pour into a large casserole or cast-iron frying pan and bake for approximately 1 hour or until set and lightly browned on top. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

CINNAMON APPLES

A delicious side dish to serve with meat or chicken.

3 golden delicious apples
⅔ cup water
½ tbsp. flour
1 tsp. cornstarch
2 tsp. margarine, melted
½ cup light brown sugar
¼ tsp. cinnamon
1 dash salt

Preheat the oven to 350. Peel and core the apples. Cut each one into 16 slices and arrange the slices in an 8 x 8 inch baking dish.

In a small bowl, combine the water with the flour, cornstarch and margarine and stir until the dry ingredients are dissolved and not lumpy. Add the brown sugar and cinnamon and stir until smooth. Pour the cinnamon mixture over the apple slices, cover the dish with foil, and bake for 40 minutes. Stir the apples every 10 minutes. Serve warm. Makes 4 servings.

HONEYED GREEN BEANS

1 package frozen green beans
½ cup water
¼ cup honey
½ tsp. garlic powder
2 tsp. lemon juice
salt and pepper to taste
½ cup slivered, toasted almonds, optional

Mix all ingredients in a 2-quart saucepan and bring to a boil. Continue boiling 5 to 10 minutes or until beans are tender. Makes 4 servings.

Treat guests to a light, elegant lunch

By MARCY GOLDMAN
Special to The CJN

Tired of hot, traditional, heavy meals? Or do you simply need a make-ahead elegant Rosh Hashanah repast? If so, you're like me. For years, I made the full nine yards of Rosh Hashanah family dinners. Given my lifestyle, though, – single, three sons, cookbook author – there is often no time to do this. And I'm sure I'm not alone – who isn't frantic, even when it's not High Holy Day time?

Over the last few years, my solution has been to prepare a late luncheon or early supper that I prepare ahead of time. I serve it as a sit-down or buffet meal, depending on the number of guests, and I make it elegant. Just because the meal is a chilled one made up of somewhat more informal dishes doesn't mean it can't still be upscale.

I really like the leisurely feel of a special luncheon or early dinner. It's more laid back and the High Holy Days usually don't fall in the height of cool fall weather. I can save brisket and meatballs for Pesach and opt for something new at this time of year.

What I also like is the flexibility of the time and the menu (you can mix and match your own dishes), and the pleasure of having everything made ahead so I can enjoy my own table, friends and family. The two main dishes go a long way, as they are substantial, fetching and set the tone. You can also expand the menu for more guests or increase the size of the dishes, and everything works as well in a sit-down meal or served as a buffet.

CLASSIC POACHED SALMON

A little goes a long way (prepared up to three days before). Serve with Dijon mustard sauce or chili horseradish sauce (see recipes below), tons of lemons, dill and parsley. If you do not have a poacher, encircle the fish in a large Dutch oven. It will poach properly. Then gently lay it out after it is cooked, in a usual presentation.

1 salmon (5 to 6 lb.)
2 cups white wine
1 medium onion – sliced
3 carrots – cut in chunks
3 ribs celery – cut in sticks
2-3 tbsp. kosher salt
1 tsp. pepper
1/4 cup minced fresh parsley
2 tbsp. fresh dill water

Place salmon in poaching pot or, alternatively, encircle the fish in a large Dutch oven. (If you don't have either of these, use the widest, deepest pot you have. Turn the fish around so that it is end to end, as if it were chasing its own tail.) Cover with water. Add wine and remaining ingredients. Bring to a boil, reduce heat and simmer until done – about 50-60 minutes (or about 10 minutes per pound).

Turn off burner and let fish cool 20 minutes. Carefully remove from poacher and place on platter. Cover and refrigerate. The next day, gently remove skin and serve on a bed of dark greens. Garnish with parsley sprigs and lemon slices. Offer with side sauces. Serves 8-14

BUFFET SAUCES FOR SALMON OR COLD TURKEY

These are lickety split to make, but wonderful when served with chilled salmon or turkey.

Dijon Sauce
1 cup mayonnaise
1/3 cup Dijon mustard
1 tbsp. each, finely minced dill and parsley

Red Sauce
1/2 cup mayonnaise
1/2 cup chili sauce
1/4 cup red or white horseradish

For both sauces: blend ingredients together, chill. Serve.

BEST BRINED & ROAST ROSH HASHANAH TURKEY

Using this method ensures a very plump, tender cold turkey.

Brining Ingredients
1 turkey (about 10 pounds)
water to cover bird
1½ cups salt, preferably kosher
1 cup sugar
¼ cup vinegar
1 large onion, chopped

Roasting Pan Ingredients
½ cup unsalted, melted margarine or olive oil
1 tbsp. paprika
1 tbsp. garlic powder
½ tsp. celery powder
½ tsp. sage coarse sea salt, fresh ground pepper
1 tbsp. sweet paprika
juice of one lemon, and one orange
½ cup white wine
1-2 cups chicken stock
1 rib of celery
2 carrots cut up
bunch of parsley
1 head garlic, with unpeeled cloves broken apart and scattered

Eight to 16 hours before cooking: put the turkey in a large stockpot. Cover with water. Remove turkey and then put in sugar, salt, vinegar and onion and stir well.

Put turkey back in pot. Refrigerate 8-16 hours.

To roast, remove turkey from brine and pat dry and place in roasting pan.

Preheat oven to 400.

In the roasting pan, add the liquid stuff from the roasting ingredients. Scatter bigger stuff from the roasting ingredients (vegetables, sliced orange, etc.) around turkey.

Smear margarine or olive oil on turkey and season with seasonings.

Stuff turkey, or if you are serving stuffing on side, squeeze a whole lemon into the turkey cavity and place it, along with an extra onion, in cavity.

Place turkey in oven, and reduce heat to 350. Roast turkey, basting with pan juice and re-applying paprika and garlic powder as needed (about every 30-45 minutes). The liberal use of these spices makes for a nice crisp skin.

For the last 45 minutes of roasting, stop basting and allow the skin to crisp further. Test turkey for doneness. Cover with foil if it's browning too fast. If it's ready, cover with foil, reduce heat to 225 and wait until serving time to take it out of oven.

Turkey should rest for 30 minutes before being chilled. Serve with sauces of your choice. Serves 12-16

MEDITERRANEAN NEW YEAR'S CHOLENT

Every time I make it, this simple dish is every bit as good as the first time I had it in a Montreal Greek restaurant. There is no way I can convey how good this dish is. You just have to try it. It is cholent, in a manner of speaking. All it requires is a slow roast. It keeps for days and is wonderful with cold main dishes, or simply with a wedge of fresh bread. It's perfect fall food.

2 cups dry jumbo lima beans
4 large ripe tomatoes
½ bunch parsley, washed and finely chopped
3 cloves of garlic, finely chopped
½ large Spanish onion, finely chopped sea salt, pepper, to taste
⅔ cup olive oil

Have an 8-x-12 inch or similar roasting pan nearby. Fill a 6-quart stockpot or Dutch oven with water to about two thirds full and boil. Stir in lima beans. Bring back to boil, and then simmer, until the beans are just tender, about 1 to 1½ hours.

Meanwhile, place tomatoes in a food processor and process to make them coarse but finely chopped – i.e. do not puree them. Remove to a bowl and do the same for the onions and then for the parsley and garlic. Preheat oven to 350.

Drain and transfer the beans to a large baking pan. Stir in tomatoes, onions, parsley, garlic and season with salt and pepper. Then pour on the olive oil and mix to blend. Bake for 1-2 hours, until beans are very tender. Serves 8-12 as an appetizer or as a side dish.

Guest Voice

Three years ago, I was offered the opportunity of a lifetime – The CJN's student column was to become my column. Once a month, I could write about whatever was on my mind, express whatever sentiments I held at the moment and convey my opinions, no matter how obscure.

For the past three years, I have relished having this outlet. More importantly though, I have been amazed at the response I have received from family, friends, old teachers and acquaintances, as well as readers from across the country. It is one thing to have the chance to write whatever is on your mind and quite another to hear how people enjoy reading it.

And so, as my time as the undergraduate columnist from Halifax (often via Toronto and Montreal) comes to an end, I cannot help but look back on the past three years and marvel at how much has changed.

When I started writing this column, I was embarking on my second year of university in Halifax. I had just moved into a house with roommates, living on my own for the first time, and everything was new and exciting. I had just taken on the leadership of the Jewish Students' Association and was eager to do what I could to help create a vibrant Jewish student life in Halifax.

Now, as I find myself in Montreal, once again getting settled in a new home, I am nostalgic for Halifax and all it offered. Don't get me wrong: I love Montreal and I am thrilled to be at McGill University, but there is an immeasurable comfort that comes with feeling settled and at home and having a keen understanding of the challenges that lie ahead of you.

Starting law school, I feel a sense of anxiety (if not downright fear) that surpasses anything I have ever felt before. Suddenly, the stakes are higher. School seems infinitely harder, the readings infinitely longer and the significance of it all infinitely greater. While the challenge that lies before me is clear, I feel I have no idea of its depth. So I find myself trying to figure out a plan of attack – looking for a way to settle my nerves and stop worrying about what the coming year has in store.

It is funny to think about the cycles of growing up. It is as if schooling is timed to ensure that just as you develop your comfort and confidence, you have to to embark on a new stage. So it was with high school, university and now, I assume, law school. Of course, there is always time for fun and enjoyment, but the pace is quick and with time flying as it does, the next stage awaits you before you have a chance to take stock of what you have accomplished.

And now, four months removed from school at King's College and life in Halifax, I am beginning to realize and appreciate what I had and accomplished there. And as I embark on the next phase, I hope to take advantage of the many valuable lessons I learned – both inside and outside of school.

It is thus with a mix of excitement and sadness that I recognize that however wonderful the experiences that await me, those of the past three years will remain unique and irreplaceable.

As a person who always has an opinion to share, it has been tremendous fun to be able to convey my thoughts to you on a monthly basis. I am forever grateful to The Canadian Jewish News for giving me this chance and editing my prose so carefully.

Lastly, it has been a running joke among my acquaintances in the past three years that I have avoided personal mentions in my column. So to all those whose names never got to grace these pages, thank you for supporting me, editing me and being there.

Most importantly, to all of you who have read my column over the past three years, thank you for allowing me to see that my words and thoughts register in the minds and hearts of others. I only hope I have the opportunity to share my thoughts with you again in the future.

David Broza wows Montreal audience

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

Israeli-born David Broza, famous for his eclectic musical stylings, performed recently at the Montreal Spectrum, much to the delight of his enthusiastic fans.

The Aug. 31st show – lively, moving, fast-paced, and vitalizing from start to finish – was Hillel Montreal's first event of the school year.

Broza, with his engaging combination of warmth and energy, captured the attention of his audience from the first strum of his Spanish flamenco guitar. He held the audience's attention with his poetic lyrics, too, each word pregnant with dramatic meaning.

His musical influences range from Middle Eastern and Spanish flamenco, to American blues, and he sings in Hebrew, Spanish and English.

Broza says his music "is inspired by rock 'n' roll, at large. My first musical inspiration was Jimi Hendrix, as well as a lot of Israeli musicians and poets from all over the world."

This year, Broza worked with the poet Yehuda Amichai. "Next, I will be writing music for a Spanish movie, as well as other occasional movie tracks." It is particularly "the process of writing that I enjoy most – it is amazing, but it is really intense," he adds.

Broza says that "people tell me, 'don't go to Texas, or to certain places, where they don't like Jews.' So I say, 'that is exactly where I am going to play.'

"It is important to stay close to the ground, to be modest, and to be real about it. I have many friends who would not last an hour in the West Bank. But I go and play there regularly and have never had any problems."

Broza introduced the last song of his concert set as one that he hopes will soon become a reality. The song was Yihiyeh Tov, (It Will Be Good), "there will be peace in Israel." The audience responded with clapping and cheering.

Broza noted that "the situation in Israel is always critical, on the verge of catastrophe, but in the end it is averted. Somehow, we get out.

"These past two weeks [during the disengagement], we expected to be the hardest, but it was much better than expected."

The audience clapped at the end of each song and whenever the singer especially stirred them with his extraordinary guitar playing and melodies.

At the end of the show, the people's enthusiastic standing ovation successfully drew the singer back to the stage for one final song.

The House helps young establish Jewish identity

By LARA GREENBERG
CJN Intern

Three years ago, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto rabbinics teacher Rabbi Rafi Lipner had an idea that made him sit up in bed – to start a centre for students.

But he didn't just want a place for young Jews to go and meet other Jews, but rather a place where they could go to take part in intellectual debates and discussions on a variety of topics related to Judaism.

He wanted to create a place where students could go to rethink everything that is a part of Jewish tradition and culture, and by debating and discussing, make these things a tangible part of their lives.

His aim was to create an environment where anyone from the ages of 17 to 24 would be comfortable to come to – "it doesn't matter whether you're Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, Reconstructionist, Egalitarian or just plain bagels and lox," as the brochure states.

It began small, with dinner and discussion evenings in his home, but Rabbi Lipner wanted something bigger.

Two years ago, an apartment on Eglinton Avenue was furnished and The House began. It looks like a trendy café, yet has the warmth of a living room.

It was called "The House" because a house is a part of one's life, said Rabbi Lipner, and the hope is that the idea will follow through that Judaism, too, is a part of one's life – something that one lives in and is comfortable in.

He said The House aims "to be a hub for people who want something more than just the Jewish social and 'Jew-do' theme."

Over the last year, courses have been taking place there nightly.

One evening they did something textual on the philosophy of Maimonides, another night they had an issues class discussing hot topics, while on other nights they had book-review classes at which they discussed different books. One of the books discussed was a philosophical work by C.S. Lewis.

"We just have to make sure that the sessions are open, accepting, honest and invigorating enough for people to want to come to and return to." Rabbi Lipner said.

Nightly sessions attracting 40-50 people over course of a week

So far, he says that although there have been heated debates, everyone has been extremely respectful and knows that the debates are all for the sake of furthering knowledge and understanding.

"We do not preach but rather try to teach what we think is beautiful about what we have in our religion," he said.

Rabbi Lipner believes that assimilation and intermarriage are only symptoms of a problem. "It is because Judaism is not offering anything to these people that they are turning away," he said. He wants to create a situation in which not marrying Jewish is not even a consideration.

"We are looking to help young people establish their Jewish identity through knowledge, empowerment and enjoyment," Rabbi Lipner said.

At the moment, the nightly sessions at The House are attracting 40 to 50 people over the course of a week.

Occasionally, when there are interesting speakers in town, Rabbi Lipner will "piggyback" on other organizations who are hosting the speaker and arrange an evening at The House.

"We have been pretty lucky with these big events and have had 40 to 70 people," he noted, before adding, "We sell students short that we only get them to stay involved and connected with a 'Jew-do' – the number of students coming to The House proves otherwise."

But at the same time, Rabbi Lipner doesn't feel a lot of people attending an event necessarily means it was successful. "It's not even about the event, but rather what happens afterwards – whether there's continuation."

During the past few months, a two-tiered board was established for The House. One level of the board includes young people who contribute ideas and help out with events, while the other level includes community representatives who act as mentors to the younger board members.

Having the board enables Rabbi Lipner to focus on the programming, ideas and events. He is excited about what lies ahead for The House and has many ideas for programs.

The key, he said, is to keep providing programs that interest the students. "There is no guarantee that if there is a program people will come out, but there is a guarantee that if there isn't a program, no one will come."

CFJS unites student leaders from across Canada

By ROBERT METH
Special to The CJN

Sixty of Canada's top Jewish student leaders recently gathered at a rural camp in northern Ontario for three days for the first annual Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS) presidents' retreat.

Held at Camp George near Parry Sound, Ont., the retreat was organized by CFJS executives with the goal of bringing together Canada's Jewish student leaders in a forum where they could discuss, learn, exchange ideas and receive resources for the upcoming school year.

The gathering was a follow-up to last year's "One" conference in Montreal, which was attended by about 300 Jewish students. The experience set the stage for national Jewish student unity, involvement and empowerment.

Sessions at the retreat tackled subjects such as ways to raise funds, how to deal with student governments and staff, and how to develop Jewish campus leadership in Canada. Many of the lectures were led by students who spoke to their peers about their personal experiences.

Jonah Mozeson, a student at the University of Alberta, attended the conference after spending the summer on Parliament Hill working for his local member of Parliament. "The conference really gave me a lot of good ideas for the upcoming school year and it was amazing to meet other Jewish student leaders from across Canada," he said.

Representing Jewish student organizations on campuses from Halifax to Vancouver, student delegates and staff from the National Jewish Campus Life, gathered to learn from each other, and to inspire those who want to make a difference on campus.

Sara Berger, CFJS vice-president of programming and one of the conference organizers, called this retreat a success and says all the hard work to put it together was worth it.

"After last year's conference in Montreal, we saw the need to unite Canada's top Jewish student leaders and organize ourselves for the upcoming academic year," Berger said.

"This retreat brought together Jewish student leaders from across the country, and we were able to offer them leadership development, while at the same time, offering our resources to ensure a successful year on campuses across Canada."

The upcoming school year will feature more CFJS events, including another "One" conference that is already in the works, as well as regional conferences.

The 13-member student executive board is the representative body of Jewish students on Canadian campuses and as such has recently been recognized internationally.

This summer, the World Union of Jewish Students voted to include the CFJS into its organization, allowing for more international exposure and development between Canada and other international Jewish student unions.

Only in its second full year of operations, CFJS is looking forward to another exciting year and to empowering students to be active on Canadian university campuses as well as in their communities.

Israel, Canada's Jewish community help victims

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Israelis and North American Jews have reached out to help victims of Hurricane Katrina.

As of last Thursday, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto had raised $130,000 for victims of Hurricane Katrina. The funds are being directed to United Jewish Communities (UJC), the umbrella group for North America's Jewish federations, as are funds from similar efforts across the continent.

In Montreal, FEDERATION CJA had raised more than $50,000 as of last Thursday, and that was without any publicity, which was set to start this week, said finance director Susan Szalpeter.

Meanwhile, the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) announced last week that it's offering a free semester at university to qualified New Orleans students – Jews and non-Jews alike.

Tens of thousands of students are enrolled in universities in New Orleans, 2,000 of them Jewish. JAFI said that as of last week, some 20 students had taken an interest in the offer.

It includes tuition, room, board, and a round trip flight to Israel. Participating universities – the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Tel Aviv University, Haifa University, Bar-Ilan University and Ben-Gurion University (BGU) – have agreed to expedite registration of the New Orleans students.

The initiative will be funded by JAFI, UJC and the Hillel Foundation for Jewish Campus Life.

Magen David Adom staffers in Tel Aviv prepare cartons of bottled water as part of an 80-ton aid shipment for victims of Hurricane Katrina. In addition, an IDF delegation, will depart Israel to co-ordinate the delivery of Israeli aid to New Orleans.

BGU announced that it was sending a team of doctors specializing in emergency medicine and disaster relief to New Orleans. They were to arrive on Friday. The effort was organized under the auspices of IsraAID, a delegation of medical personnel, psychologists and search and rescue workers.

On Thursday, Israel sent humanitarian and medical experts, as well as 80 tons of food packages, diapers, beds, blankets, generators and other essentials. The Jewish National Fund helped fund the shipment.

In New York, the Union for Reform Judaism inaugurated a project called "Jacob's Ladder." Reform congregations throughout North America will collect goods and supplies for Katrina victims. The group's Mississippi-based Henry S. Jacobs Camp, which took in 150 hurricane evacuees, will serve as a staging and distribution area.

B'nai Brith Canada is organizing a nationwide clothing drive. For more details, visit www.bnaibrith.ca.

To donate to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Katrina Disaster Relief Fund, go to www.jewishtoronto.com (UJA Federation's website).

In Montreal, donations to the FEDERATION CJA Hurricane Katrina Disaster Relief Fund can be made by calling its hotline at 514-343-8700, or by sending a cheque to FEDERATION CJA: Hurricane Katrina Disaster Relief, 1 Cummings Square, Montreal, Quebec H3W 1M6.

Other organizations are also collecting funds.

To donate to the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, send a cheque to 3845 Bathurst St., Ste. 301, Toronto M3H 3N2 and write "Hurricane Relief" on the memo line of the cheque. Further information is available at www.urj.org/relief.

Donations can also be made to Chabad's Disaster Relief Fund, 770 Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn, NY 11213; at www.bnaibrith.org.; to the Orthodox Union (mark cheque and envelope "Hurricane Katrina Relief Fund"), 11 Broadway, 14th Floor, New York, NY 10004; or through the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Canadian Region, 1000 Finch Ave. W., Ste. 508, Toronto M3J 2V5. Cheques should be clearly marked "Hurricane Relief."

Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee has also set up a fund to provide emergency relief and necessities to all victims, as well as to affected Jewish communities. To donate, call 416-964-7698, ext. 21.

Katrina Aftermath

Toronto couple returns from New Orleans

"I feel so sorry for the people of New Orleans," said Shuster. "It's devastating to see [family separations] and people being relocated all over… We came back to heaven."

The contrast to Toronto – and to the New Orleans Shuster recalls from a trip last year – is enormous. "I think New Orleans is one of the nicest cities. I love the entertainment. The jazz – you're not going to find anything better. The food is incredible. The night life is a delight. There are many historic sections. It's a grand city."

Shuster's group left a decimated New Orleans on a bus that was part of a convoy. Soldiers loaded the buses with hurricane victims. "Even the bus driver was crying. He drove 34 hours to get there from Ohio, out of the goodness of his heart," Shuster said.

A Texan trucker took Shuster and Rosen, their friends and two other Toronto tourists from the bus's stopping point – Shuster thinks it was in Fort Smith, Ark. – to Shreveport, La., where they were able to catch a flight to Dallas, and then home.

A mishap on landing in Toronto meant they had to leave the plane via emergency exit chutes, before reuniting with family members anxiously awaiting their return.

Marni Elmaleh, a 24-year-old student who lives in Thornhill, returned home three days before Shuster and Rosen. She was given shelter by a Chabad rabbi and his family, staying on the upper floor of his home in the New Orleans suburb of Metairie until the water outside subsided enough for them to leave by van.

Marilyn Rosen and Fred Shuster

On their way out of the city, she witnessed some of the damage wreaked by the storm – "huge trees that had been completely uprooted" – but she said she saw none of the more violent and disturbing images that dominated television news.

Ironically, Elmaleh and a friend went to New Orleans because she wanted to use two free airline tickets, good for anywhere in North America, that were about to expire. She received them when she was bumped from a previous flight.

Elmaleh said people didn't initially expect "anything close" to what actually happened.

"Every summer, they say there's a huge hurricane coming. People didn't start evacuating until [a day or two before]."

Memories of a robust New Orleans Jewish life

By GAIL CHALEW
Baltimore Jewish Times

BALTIMORE — Unfortunately, the more I write about the New Orleans Jewish community, the more it seems like a eulogy. I find myself writing in the past tense and then must go back and change every "was" to "is."

Comment

Certainly, the community will never be the same. Just as certainly, members of the Jewish community are now in exile, scattered in a Diaspora that stretches across the country.

As with New Orleans, in which Creoles and Cajuns mix together to create a rich culture of music and food, the Jewish community is a gumbo in which many different flavors blend together to create a much enriched stew.

Yet, in many ways, the Jewish community is an anomaly in New Orleans, even apart from the obvious religious differences.

New Orleans is a Catholic community through and through. Its elites are not WASPs but Catholics. Mardi Gras has its roots in Catholicism, while parochial schools educate a very large proportion of students, every restaurant serves fish on Friday and even mall food courts have Lenten specials before Easter.

But the differences go deeper.

While New Orleans sometimes seems more like a Caribbean island – focused more on partying than on work and certainly not a slave to efficiency – the Jewish community is quite well-organized. For a community of its size – about 12,000 people – it boasts many organizations.

Along the religious spectrum are four Reform temples, one Conservative synagogue, two Orthodox synagogues and two Chabad Centers. There is a Jewish federation that raises close to $3 million annually; a Jewish Endowment Foundation, under whose auspices more than 30 post-b'nai mitzvah teens have established their own endowment funds; a Jewish Family Service; a Hillel; and a JCC with two campuses. Three kosher restaurants, one that serves kosher jambalaya, etouffée (a local stew) and gumbo, thrive.

It has a Jewish hospital and a Jewish nursing home, with independent and assisted living facilities as well.

Yet, in many ways, the Jewish community is infused with the ambience and culture of New Orleans.

Like a gumbo, its diverse ingredients of Jews, ranging from Chabad to the unaffiliated, mix well. My family, along with many members of the Reform and Conservative communities, were invited to the recent wedding of the daughter of the Chabad rabbi. Chabadniks sit on the federation board. The Reform and Orthodox rabbis work closely together on community programs.

In New Orleans, church and state are not separated all that clearly, which creates some problems – prayers to Jesus said at the start of government meetings and statues of Jesus on the firehouse at Christmas come to mind.

But this mixing of church and state has positive effects as well.

New Orleanians value religion and religious expression and are quick to give respect to all those for whom religion is important. After asking what Jewish church I went to, my neighbours and acquaintances would display a genuine interest and concern for my Judaism. When my son, the only Jewish member of his soccer team, had his bar mitzvah two years ago, the entire team attended the service, giving up a tournament to do so.

The Jewish and Christian faith communities work closely on many civic issues, Loyola University co-sponsors a large interfaith seder, and many church groups learn more about Israel by viewing the room-sized land map of the Jewish state that is owned by the federation.

Over the past decade, the Jewish community has itself become more committed to Jewish observance and study.

Reflecting national trends, New Orleans' Reform temples have incorporated more Hebrew and rituals into their worship services, and every synagogue has a full program of adult Jewish education. The federation sponsors the Florence Melton Adult Mini-School, as well as a savings program for Israel trips for teens.

In another convergence of the Jewish community and New Orleans culture, Mardi Gras is not just for Catholics anymore.

Although the first King of Carnival in the 1870s was Jewish, until recently Mardi Gras krewes, which stage each parade, were closed to Jews. The old-line krewes still exclude Jews. However, many Jewish professionals and business people have joined the new Super-Krewes, which stage mega-parades with floats that stretch several city blocks.

There is now even a Jewish krewe.

The Krewe de Jieux now marches – or rather horahs – through the French Quarter to kick off the Mardi Gras season. Its hand-decorated float drawn by a mule, its throws (beads, cups and glittered bagels) and the marchers' costumes proudly proclaim the Krewe's Jewishness while skewering Jewish and Mardi Gras stereotypes at the same time.

Instead of the traditional king and queen, the Krewe de Jieux has a Big Macher and a Jewish American Princess.

The Krewe has marched as the House of Jieuxs, dressing up as the Blues Brothers. It has sashayed as the Beverly Hill Jieuxbillies, with hillbillies marching alongside the Rich Doctor (dressed as an African witch doctor). This past January, its theme was "What Would Cheesus Do?" Parma John the Baptist in a monk's robe horahed next to cows, complete with udders oozing Cheez Whiz.

The Krewe also has a more serious side. Many of its members, who are a bit quirky and offbeat, are not affiliated with the Jewish community, and the Krewe serves as their only link to it. As well, the Krewe sponsors a Purim parade, a Passover Krewe-Seder and Shabbat dinners throughout the year.

I fear for the future not only of the Krewe de Jieux, the clearest expression of Jewish New Orleans' joie de vivre. I also fear for the future of the organized Jewish community.

Even before Hurricane Katrina, the Jewish population had been declining, primarily because of the poor New Orleans economy that provided few high-tech or corporate opportunities. In recent years, many young people have moved to Atlanta or Houston in search of good jobs.

Now the exodus will be accelerated.

Nearly every member of the Jewish community has sustained some damage to their homes, and countless people have lost them completely. One Jewish neighbourhood was located close to a breach in the levee.

Certainly, everyone has been scarred by the evacuation experience and seeing the shocking images of their city. In e-mail after e-mail, people are questioning whether they wish to return.

Because many members of the Jewish community are professionals – lawyers and doctors are quite over-represented – they have the opportunity to practice their skills anywhere. Many will be taking that opportunity.

My family may join the exodus as well.

Gail Chalew is a New Orleans freelance writer now based in Baltimore.

Ex-Winnipegger heads New Orleans relief efforts

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Adam Bronstone admits that he is torn.

Although he is looking forward to coming back to his hometown Winnipeg to lead Yom Tov services next month, he also feels a strong obligation to stay where he is in Houston tending to the needs of the beleaguered New Orleans Jewish community – his adopted one – in its struggle to recover from the devastation wrought by Hurricane Katrina.

"The phone is ringing constantly," said Bronstone, director of communications for the New Orleans Jewish community for the past four years. "I really feel that my place is here."

Prior to the disaster that struck the city on Aug. 29, New Orleans had a Jewish population of about 10,000 to 12,000. The community had a long history dating back to the early 19th century.

"Many members of the community have roots that go back five or six generations," said Bronstone, 36, noting that New Orleans' Touro Synagogue – founded by prominent early 19th century Jewish businessman and community leader Judah Touro – is the sixth oldest synagogue in North America.

"The commnity has a strong classic German Reform tradition," Bronstone says. "Seventy per cent of New Orleans Jewish population is Reform. It was quite an adjustment for me coming from Winnipeg, where the only Reform congregation is very small."

Bronstone, who is not married, left New Orleans on Aug. 27, just ahead of the official call to evacuate the city. He said he lost everything when his apartment was flooded and is living with a colleague who works for the Jewish Federation Greater Houston.

He is working out of the offices of the Houston federation leading relief efforts for the New Orleans Jewish community.

"We are doing everything we can to locate people and get them out," he said. "We are putting together lists of people and trying to arrange assistance and shelter for them where needed."

While most of New Orleans' Jews have left the city, Bronstone said the number that remain is uncertain.

"We know there are still some of our people in there, but we don't know where they are," he said last week. "With the help of the sheriff, we are trying to organize a search and rescue operation."

He reported that at least two people in the city's Jewish seniors home died just before the facility was evacuated.

Israel's ZAKA relief organization is trying to commandeer some vehicles to pull out the dead, but Bronstone said he would rather use all available vehicles to take out the living first.

New Orleans had nine synagogues. Bronstone said one Orthodox shul, Beth Israel, is a "write-off" because of the extensive damage it received. Some of the others were flooded, while others have suffered only minimal damage.

Bronstone praised Houston's Jewish federation and community for the help and hospitality they are providing for New Orleans' dispossessed Jews.

He said, for example, that one young couple expecting their first child have been invited to move in with a Houston family for as long as they need to.

He also described the help pouring in from Jewish communities all over North America as "staggering."

He is hoping to return to New Orleans soon himself to see what he can salvage of his own belongings, but he said he won't do so until he can arrange proper security.

In Winnipeg, he and Cantor Arky Berkal are scheduled to lead Yom Tov services at Congregation Shir Tikvah, a three-year-old Conservative congregation that only comes together for the High Holy Days.

Facts about the Big Easy's Jewish community

Jewish New Orleans

• The Jewish community in greater New Orleans is about 10,000 to 12,000 people, out of total area population of about 1.2 million people.

• There are nine synagogues – four are Orthodox, four are Reform and one is Conservative.

• Two of the Orthodox synagogues are Chabad centres. The other two have a small elderly population, of which only one has a part-time rabbi.

• The area has three kosher restaurants, one kosher deli and mini-market, but all kosher meat and bread is bought frozen. There are two Jewish community centres, two Jewish day schools, a Jewish Family Service, a Hillel, and a Jewish federation.

• In addition to two Chabad Houses, Chabad runs a day school, the mikvah and the Louisiana Kashrut Commission.

• Baton Rouge, Louisiana's state capital, is about a 75 to 90-minute drive from New Orleans.

Areas affected by flooding

The eastern parts of New Orleans – 9th Ward, New Orleans East, Challemette, and Slidell – were hit the worst, while the western parts – Uptown, Metairie, Kenner – fared better, and most of the Jewish community is located Uptown and in Metairie.

• The 9th Ward: A short walk from the French Quarter and where part of the levee holding back the Mississippi River broke. A very poor and crime-ridden area, it was flooded with 20 feet of water.

• New Orleans East: Most of the news reports that show flooding up to house rooftops come from New Orleans East. The residents there are almost entirely African American. The entire area may need to be bulldozed after the water is finally drained from the city.

• Challemette: east of New Orleans East and home to few Jews. Most of the people who lived there worked in nearby oil refineries.

• Slidell: 30 minutes east of New Orleans and across the lake, it was home to only a few Jews, and was totally flooded.

• Lakeview: North of downtown and right next to Lake Pontchetrain, it's where the levee beside the lake broke. About 15 per cent of greater New Orleans' Jewish community lives in the area, but it's home to only one synagogue. The area was flooded with about eight feet of water. If any Jews are among the dead here, they will likely be elderly people who died of heat exhaustion waiting to be rescued.

• Uptown: Within New Orleans city limits, this area contains historic St. Charles Avenue and is home to 35 to 40 per cent of the Jewish community. It has two large Reform synagogues, a Chabad synagogue, a JCC, and the Hillel for Tulane University. Since this area is higher than downtown, it only experienced minor flooding, with about two feet of water.

• Metairie: This large suburb in Jefferson Parish borders Lake Pontchetrain and also contains about 35 to 40 per cent of the Jewish community. It has a Chabad Center, a Conservative synagogue, a Reform synagogue, a JCC, two day schools, and is home to the Jewish federation. Metairie was flooded with about five feet of water, but many of its houses and buildings were built a few feet above street level.

Mississippi communities pick up the pieces

Biloxi synagogue damaged

By LARRY BROOK
Deep South Jewish Voice

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. — Along the Mississippi Gulf coast, hurricanes were always measured against Camille, which struck in 1969. During that horrific storm, Biloxi's Beth Israel Congregation didn't even leak.

The situation now is vastly different, as Katrina rewrote the book on hurricanes. The 70-family congregation, with the only synagogue on the Mississippi coast, has a rebuilding job to do, both with the synagogue itself and with many members' homes.

Beth Israel still stands, though much of the brick exterior was peeled away. Some upstairs windows were blown out, but the roof over the sanctuary looked intact from the outside. The Torahs were removed before the storm and are safe.

The synagogue is located two blocks from the beach, which saw a 25-foot storm surge. A casino located on the water near the synagogue was lifted across the highway and deposited on the other side. Miles of U.S. Interstate 90 along the beachfront show complete devastation, and some communities closer to New Orleans were reportedly wiped off the map.

On Aug. 28, with the storm bearing down on the coast, Dan Romm, a doctor, evacuated to the Biloxi VA Medical Center. As the storm hit, everyone moved into the hallways and rooms without windows. The windows had not been tested for 150-mile-a-hour winds.

"The Biloxi VA shelter turned out to be the best place to be," Romm said. The Gulfport VA campus, located closer to the beach, was wiped out.

With a generator, food and water, "we were in relative paradise," though he also knew that his home had 22 feet of water in it.

"Imagine all your furniture placed in a gigantic washing machine and stop the machine after the rinse cycle. Don't forget to throw in the mud and debris," he said. While the house is intact, he figures it will be a total loss because of mould. He is now in the Atlanta area, weighing his options.

Lori Beth Susman, a past president of Beth Israel, was in Destin, Fla., during the storm. She said the outpouring of support from across the country has been overwhelming, with offers of housing and assistance, even of "adopting" the congregation.

Further inland, Hattiesburg's B'nai Israel had a large proportion of its shingles ripped from the roof, but a large tree that was toppled missed the building. Rabbi Celso Cukierkorn was in Spain when the storm hit, and is now trying to make his way back from Kansas, where he is staying with relatives.

He said there has been violence due to scarcity, including a person being killed over a bag of ice. Located an hour north of the Mississippi Gulf Coast, Hattiesburg is one of the last places that received assistance.

Rabbi Cukierkorn said congregants have indicated that everyone in the Jewish community "is fine."

In Jackson, a city that is seeing its population double, there are about 75 Jewish evacuees currently in town, with more expected.

Bert Rubinsky came back from a bar mitzvah in Chicago before the storm hit to find 19 relatives who had fled the approaching storm. They are still staying with him.

His wife's grandmother died in Lafayette, La., en route to Houston after being evacuated from a New Orleans hospital.

Birmingham is also expecting more evacuees. The Birmingham Jewish Federation has set a goal of raising $1 million (US) in relief aid through the federation from the city's 5,300 Jews. Resettlement services are already up and running, and a counselling group for New Orleans evacuees is set to start meeting in the next few days.

Katrina flooded downtown Mobile, Ala., but the city's two synagogues are further inland. Springhill Avenue Temple, still doing roof repairs from Hurricane Ivan, saw a large number of branches down in front of the building.

Biloxi's Beth Israel Congregation

The Jackson-based Goldring/Woldenberg Institute of Southern Jewish Life has set up a fund and will serve as a hub of activity for the region. The ISJL serves small Jewish communities in Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Arkansas, and is uniquely situated to help. The institute will advise national organizations looking for local contacts in affected communities.

Jackson's Beth Israel Congregation opened its doors on Sept. 1 after several days without power. There was a bar mitzvah scheduled for Sept. 3, for the grandson of the state's only Holocaust survivor. Despite the situation, office manager Ellen Alexander said the congregation would "celebrate and do what we can do."

Family searches for stability in Houston

'The kids are still in shock. Gabriel still acts like we're having a weekend sleepover'

By MICHAEL C. DUKE
Houston Jewish Herald-Voice

HOUSTON — Jodi and Raúl Zighelboim arrived in Houston late Saturday evening, Aug. 27, with their two children, Selah and Gabriel, and little more than a change of clothes for each member of the family.

The Zighelboims have evacuated their Uptown New Orleans home five times in recent years under threat of hurricanes. Each time, they have come to Houston and stayed a few days with Jodi's mother and great-aunt, and then returned home without any major problems. They thought this time would be no different.

After waking up Tuesday morning, ready to make the crawl back home on Interstate 10 East, the Zighelboims instead learned that more than 80 per cent of their city had been swallowed up overnight by Hurricane Katrina's floodwaters, breaching levees at Industrial Canal, Treme and Lakeview. Physically and emotionally, neither Jodi nor Raúl was prepared for this news. Their two-storey home is located in an area that was heavily submerged, according to aerial photographs they saw on the nightly news. With their entire lives now under several feet of water, the Zighelboims felt as if they themselves had drowned.

"The overwhelming sense of uncertainty – with everything – has been the most difficult aspect to deal with," said Jodi, who was pensively turning pages in an organizer she had opened at her mother's dining room table. This was the Zighelboims' sixth day in Houston. All four had been sleeping in a single room and living out of a half-empty suitcase. As Jodi spoke, Raul was pacing in the next room, and their third-grader, Gabriel, was playing with Sunny, the dog, at his father's feet.

Jodi glanced at her husband and then said with desperation: "We simply have no idea what lies ahead of us. We thought we'd be gone only a couple of days, so we brought nothing. The last time we made this trip, we packed as much as we could and brought it with us. But we left this time in such a hurry. I wish I had our pictures – oh God, I hope we haven't lost them all."

It would be another 2½ hours before the Zighelboims, overwrought with fear and anxiety, would see anyone from their New Orleans community. Jodi pointed out that very few family members or friends even knew where they were, and vice versa.

"So far, we haven't been able to make contact with anybody. Our cellphones don't work and our work e-mails are down. I feel so disoriented. There's so much disorder. But thank God, we made it here safely, and as a family. Otherwise, I wouldn't be able to cope."

The cellphone issue is perturbing, Jodi noted, as this is her primary means of communication with the community back home. Jodi is a professor of health sciences at New Orleans' Tulane University and also relies on the school's e-mail system, which is currently down, as well. She had no Web-based e-mail address before the evacuation, nor does she have access to many of her friends' and colleagues' e-mail addresses.

"It is unbelievable to me that these cellphone companies have been so unwilling to help us out. As far as I know, there haven't been any special accommodations set up for those of us with 504 area codes, despite the fact that we're still being charged for service. My phone cannot accept incoming calls, which means that nobody can get hold of us – including our insurance company. The only real option is to buy one of those pre-paid phones, which cost something like $80 up front, plus 10 cents a minute. And we need to keep money in our pockets for things like food and clothing, at this point."

The Zighelboims use Verizon Wireless, which the Jewish Herald-Voice contacted regarding this issue on Sept. 2. Over the phone, a Houston-based Verizon sales representative said the Zighelboims would be able to transfer their existing service to the Houston area, and would be given a working Houston-area code and a free phone. Yet, when Jodi attempted this at a Verizon storefront, she was told that she would have to first cancel her existing contract, which would involve paying a cancellation fee, and then sign up for new service in the Houston area. She would also have to buy a new phone. The Jewish Herald-Voice then called several other cellphone providers hoping that they might be able to help the Zighelboims, but found no offers.

"Having a cellphone that works would provide some much-needed stability," Jodi said, "which is what we are so desperate for right now. I just want somebody to know that we are here…"

Before she could finish her next words, the doorbell rang. A bouquet of flowers arrived for Jodi, sent by a friend who apparently was able to track her down. The entire family came into the room to see. Gabriel wanted to know if the flowers were from a secret admirer. The kids soon left the room, but Raúl joined his wife at the table. He was wearing a cap that read "Hard Luck Café."

"What I'd like is to have our city back," Raúl said. "But how and when can we return? What if our employers and these major corporations don't come back? What are we to do then? This is a great fear of mine. We need jobs so that we can feed and clothe our families."

High water fails to stop wedding

By MICHAEL C. DUKE
Houston Jewish Herald-Voice

HOUSTON — The invitations were mailed. The gown was fitted. The rings, engraved with each other's Hebrew names, were ready to be exchanged. Then, an uninvited guest arrived.

Jennifer Pollack and Andrew Friedberg would have been married Sept. 4 at New Orleans' Temple Gates of Prayer had Hurricane Katrina not turned their city into an Atlantean wreck.

It took the couple 12 hours to evacuate the Crescent City on Saturday, Aug. 28, and they now are living with Andrew's parents, Michael and Linda Friedberg, in Houston. As Andrew and Jennifer received a special blessing at Houston's Temple Emanu El two days after their arrival, they were still hopeful for a New Orleans wedding. The next morning, however, the levees were breached, and their plans, along with most everything they owned, were sent adrift.

Yet, it did not take Andrew and Jennifer long to make up their minds on where to go next. After discussing it with their parents, they chose to drop anchor in Houston and move forward with their wedding plans. The challenge would be to have everything ready in five days time.

"There are several different reasons why we decided not to postpone our wedding," Jennifer explained on the afternoon of Friday, Sept. 2, just two days before the ceremony would take place. "It's a mitzvah to be married, and Andrew and I feel that by still having our wedding this weekend, we will be doing something good for our families, and something particularly special for the entire New Orleans Jewish community. We believe that this might be a source of hope for the many who are feeling hopeless.

"Jewish tradition says to gone on."

Jennifer and Andrew Friedberg
[Courtesy Houston Jewish Herald-Voice]

Jennifer and Andrew both attended the University of Texas at Austin. After graduation in 2002, they moved to Boston, where Jennifer wrote for the Milford Daily News and Andrew enrolled in law school. In May 2005, the couple relocated to New Orleans, Jennifer's hometown. They purchased a Lakeview home shortly thereafter, and even picked out matching Toyota Corollas. As Jennifer worked hard planning their September wedding, Andrew clerked for Fifth Circuit Judge Jacques L. Wiener, Jr. and studied for the Louisiana state bar exam. Having just taken the exam, he fears his results might be lost in the flood.

Jennifer's father, Jack, called the couple on Saturday morning, advising them to evacuate the city. Jennifer said she thought he was kidding and hung up the phone. Her mother, Peggy, called next, and told them to turn on the news.

Before evacuating New Orleans with their extended family, Jennifer and Andrew made a trip to a home improvement store, where they bought plywood to protect their home from Katrina's torrents. "And, of course, this turned out to be a complete waste of time and energy," Andrew lamented. "These were precious hours that we could have used to pack our things. But we thought that we'd only be gone for two or three days, so we essentially left everything behind."

Everything would include Jennifer's wedding gown and accessories, Andrew's tuxedo, their wedding rings, their ketubah and wedding gifts.

"Looking back, though, I'm just glad we made it here safely," he said. "This whole experience puts life into perspective. We lost more in one day than most people will lose in a lifetime. Yet, we made it out with each other, and that's all that matters. 'Stuff' can always be replaced."

Stating her marital vows to Andrew two days later, Jennifer would say that they "lost everything… yet lost nothing at all."

Since deciding to go through with their wedding, Jennifer and Andrew had to balance the task of planning a new wedding in less than a week's time and handle issues pertaining to property damage and the loss of their home.

"We're six people in the house where we're staying, and nobody is sleeping well. The phone starts ringing at 7 a.m. every morning and doesn't stop until late each night," Andrew said.

In terms of re-planning the wedding ceremony in Houston, Jennifer and Andrew were overwhelmed with things to do. One of the reasons they chose the date they was that Andrew's parents were married the same weekend 27 years before.

"So, to coincide with my parents' anniversary, we've made arrangements to be married at Beth Yeshurun in the very same place they were married, the Greenfield Chapel," Andrew said before the big day.

"Everybody in Houston has been so wonderful and generous in helping us make this happen. We would not have been able to pull this off without their support. It took us nearly two years to plan our first wedding, and now we have less than a week. The funny thing is that the new one will be pretty close to the first, and in some ways, it will be more special, since the community has stepped in with so much help," he added.

Of the 240 guests invited to New Orleans, Jennifer and Andrew expected to have at least 140 at their Houston wedding, plus those Houstonians who otherwise would not have been able to make the trip east.

Though the reception would not be as elaborate as they had originally planned, the couple said they are in no way disappointed. "Rather than having the reception overlooking the Mississippi River, we instead will have it at the shul, which we are very grateful to have. After all, it's the people that will make it special," Andrew said.

In a show of community co-operation, Beth Yeshurun's senior rabbi, David Rosen agreed to co-officiate the service alongside Rabbi Robert Loewy of New Orleans Congregation Gates of Prayer. Cantorial soloist Victoria May, also from New Orleans, and guitarist Steve Daum provided the ceremony's music.

Though it took Jennifer more than a month to choose her wedding gown, she was fortunate enough to find a replacement in three hours. Her new dress is fairly close to the first one, she said, and it still made her feel like a bride. "Of course, it's not the dress that counts," Andrew told his future wife. "It's the bride inside."

Though Andrew never had the opportunity to see Jennifer in the original gown, she had pictures taken of her in it prior to the evacuation, and their photographer kept them safe and dry. He was also able to make it to Houston for the wedding.

Meanwhile, a menswear store in Houston came to Andrew's aid by giving him a complimentary tuxedo rental, and he and Jennifer also picked out temporary replacement wedding bands.

The couple had a honeymoon to Aruba planned, but decided to cancel.

"It just wouldn't feel right going. We wouldn't be able to enjoy ourselves. Besides, we need to be here with our family right now," Jennifer said.

The couple said they are fairly certain they will stay in Houston and not return to New Orleans. Jennifer said she will look for work as a journalist, and Andrew will finish out the year clerking and perhaps study for the Texas bar.

Having given tzedakah their entire lives, they said they are uneasy with being on the receiving end for the first time.

"We helped out with the recent tsunami relief effort in Southeast Asia, and I remember thinking, "Wow, that could be us" – and now it is us," Andrew said. "This whole experience makes me want to volunteer and help others even more, which, I guess, is the best way we can show our appreciation for all that has been done for us."

New school provides order and stability for kids

Originally from Lima, Peru, Raúl works as director of technology for a New Orleans computer networking firm, which he believes will not return to the Crescent City. Together, he and Jodi own a home for which they still have 11 years left on their mortgage. They also own two vehicles, one of which was left behind. They have been sending their children to a private Jewish day school.

The Zighelboims said they are fortunate to always have been able to provide for their family, as well as give tzedakah. They are very worried about what they will be left with – and without – in Katrina's aftermath. As is evident from his facial expression, Raúl is now struggling with the reality that he and his family are in need of assistance.

"I need a job. I need a job," he repeated, blanching.

Jodi is also concerned. She said she hopes the catastrophic flood has not jeopardized her teaching position, for this would put the Zighelboims under even greater hardship. Tulane University, which established a satellite campus in Houston last year for its MBA program, now has its headquarters at the Marriott Hotel, and is working to contact its professors and students. A temporary website has been established and features up-to-date information regarding faculty paycheques, health insurance and much-needed answers to questions that people like Jodi have been asking.

In the meantime, however, Jodi asked: "What are we going to do here for the next six months if we can't find jobs? We're going to go crazy."

"I'm sure we'll do what we've been doing since Tuesday morning," Raúl added, "and that's to cry a lot."

More than finding work in Houston, the Zighelboims said they are concerned about their children, the effect that this experience will have on their lives. "Our greatest fear is that Gabriel and Selah will begin to have nightmares when they are confronted with the reality that they might never see many of their friends again," Raúl said.

One area in which the Zighelboims have found some comfort is that they have been able to meet their children's educational needs. "Getting our kids into school has been a blessing," Jodi said. Before Hurricane Katrina, both Zighelboim children attended the New Orleans Jewish Day School, which shares a building with the Jewish Community Center in Metairie. Selah and Gabriel are now enrolled at Houston's Beth Yeshurun Day School.

"This is one of the few things that we've been able to accomplish right away. And I have Mindy Rosenthal [at Beth Yeshurun Day School] to thank for this. She was so incredibly wonderful to us, so welcoming and compassionate. And the kids seem to be comfortable there, which is what they need right now more than anything – to feel safe and secure."

"The simple act of taking our kids to school each morning will give us a little order and stability, as well," Raúl added. "It's so difficult for us to not have a routine right now. We miss our schedules. Our lives are in chaos without them."

Jodi said she and her husband had already paid the entire year's tuition for both Selah and Gabriel at the New Orleans Jewish Day School and would therefore be unable to pay tuition again for a new school in Houston. When she met with Rosenthal on Sept. 1, Jodi learned that her children would be allowed to enrol free of charge because of their circumstances. (Other Jewish day schools in Houston also have accepted students from the Greater New Orleans area under similar conditions.) Jodi brought Selah and Gabriel with her to meet Rosenthal and to make sure her children would feel at home there.

Selah is 10 and in Grade 5. She said she thinks she will like her new school, and hopes her parents don't worry too much about her and her brother. Gabriel returned to the table wearing an itchy new shirt and clutching a blueprint he drew of his grandmother's house – highlighting every hiding place and "secret passage." He said he likes Houston because people can cross the street here without fear of being hit by a car. Science is his favourite subject.

"The kids are still in shock," whispered Jodi, as she and Raúl began to unfold a map of Houston between them. "Gabriel still acts like we're having a weekend sleepover."

Later that evening, the Zighelboims were reunited with many of their friends from the New Orleans Jewish community. Like many synagogues across Greater Houston, Congregation Beth Yeshurun hosted a special Erev Shabbat service and an Oneg Shabbat for families displaced by Hurricane Katrina. Besides dinner, new clothing was offered to those in need.

Though still feeling despair and pain, Jodi, in particular, appeared to be a different person after spotting the first familiar face from home. "Thank God we have each other," she repeated, her face radiating. "Thank God for community."

Reports shed little light on Arafat's demise

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — The mystery of Yasser Arafat's death lives on.

After months of silence from the Paris hospital where the former Palestinian Authority president died of an undisclosed illness last November, two reputable newspapers finally obtained his medical records.

But the retrospective diagnoses offered last week by Ha'aretz and the New York Times were remarkably different.

"Doctors: Arafat died of AIDS or was poisoned," the liberal Israeli daily blared in a banner headline.

By contrast, the Times wrote, "Medical records say Arafat died from a stroke."

Both papers had consulted with eminent medical experts, so their varying views only served to perpetuate the schism between conspiracy theorists – of both pro-Arafat and anti-Arafat camps – and Palestinian Authority, Israeli and French officials who insist there was no evidence of foul play.

"I hope that people will start refraining from continuing to target Arafat after his death," said Saeb Erekat, who served as a senior aide to the Palestine Liberation Organization chief.

Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom voiced the wish that "all of these fables and rumours be struck from our agenda once and for all." He was echoed by his French counterpart, who was visiting Israel.

"One should always be careful with publishing causes of death on the front pages," said Philippe Douste-Blazy, a physician.

Yasser Arafat

After two years in which his health failed in trying conditions at his West Bank compound, Arafat collapsed last October and was airlifted to a hospital outside Paris. He was pronounced dead Nov. 11, following several days in which conflicting reports had him either comatose or experiencing miracle recoveries.

His widow and heir, Suha, kept all doctors' reports strictly under wraps.

To Palestinians embittered with Israel's handling of Arafat and prone to explaining political developments with conspiracy theories, the poisoning theory had appeal.

To those bitter at Arafat's corruption and intrigued by his long-distance marriage to Suha – after decades in which rumours swirled about his sexuality – AIDS seemed equally likely.

Ha'aretz and the Times agree that the Palestinian leader succumbed to massive internal bleeding, and that it is impossible to determine exactly what infection caused it.

The Times said its experts' review "suggests that poisoning was highly unlikely and dispels a rumour that he may have died of AIDS" – though it noted that the absence of an AIDS test in the medical report is highly unusual.

Ha'aretz suggested that poison, perhaps ricin, could have been slipped into Arafat's food, but also noted that he could simply have suffered standard food poisoning. Ha'aretz further quoted Gil Lugassi, president of the Israel Hematologists Association, who said that Arafat's symptoms as described in the medical report were consistent with the onset of AIDS.

Lugassi received uncanny endorsement from Ashraf Al-Kurdi, Arafat's Jordanian physician.

Though he played no part in the Palestinian leader's final treatment – and refused to take part in a post-death investigation because Suha Arafat had not allowed an autopsy to be conducted – Kurdi told Israel's Channel Two television that Arafat indeed had the AIDS virus in his blood. However, he claimed it had been injected into Arafat to cover up the fact that he had been poisoned.

Canadian re-arrested in Israel

By PAUL SHINDMAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Former Montreal resident Efraim Hershkovits was arrested by police in Israel only days after his release from administrative detention.

Israeli news reports said three people associated with the radical Kach movement were arrested Sept. 4 in the Israeli Arab town of Shfaram while putting up posters with a picture of Eden Natan-Zada, the IDF soldier who opened fire and killed four Shfaram residents in early August. Natan-Zada was subsequently killed by residents after he had been subdued and Israeli police were already present in the area.

Israel police spokesperson Mickey Rosenfeld said a court gag order prevented details of the case being released, but a lawyer known for close contacts to Kach said Hershkovits was one of the three men arrested.

"It's the same Hershkovits," the lawyer said on condition of anonymity.

"He was released before two weeks or so, and several days after this he was arrested in Shfaram."

Hershkovits, 22, was arrested in August after the funeral for Natan-Zada and placed in administrative detention by Israeli defence officials without charges being laid. At the time, he was suspected of planning to disrupt the withdrawal from Israeli settlements in Gaza.

Although the Canadian Embassy is not allowed to release names, an embassy spokesperson told The CJN that consular assistance was being provided to a Canadian citizen who was under arrest.

"We're in touch with the individual and the person's family and are providing consular assistance," Natali Amar said.

A copy of the controversial poster with Eden Natan-Zada's image as it appeared in Yediot Achronot.

The Yediot Achronot newspaper reported that police received a telephone call from a Shfaram resident at about 4 a.m. on Sept. 4 complaining that three men were hanging signs in town.

Police found the men posting signs with Natan-Zada's image that praised Natan-Zada and were critical of the police, alleging they allowed Shfaram residents to attack and kill Natan-Zada after he had stopped shooting and had been subdued.

The other two men arrested with Hershkovits were identified as haredim, Yediot reported. One was from the West Bank town of Tapuah, where Natan-Zada was living before the attack, and the other was from Holon, just south of Tel Aviv.

Kach spokesperson Itamar Ben-Gvir told the newspaper the men were arrested for political reasons.

"The central message of the posters is that a public committee to investigate the murder of soldier Eden Zada must be established," Ben-Gvir said, adding that a month after the incident, it was still unclear how Natan-Zada was killed, despite having been handcuffed and under police control.

Ben-Gvir called for the police and Natan-Zada's killers to be punished.

In August, Hershkovits was arrested and ordered held without trial for three months, but he was apparently released after Israeli residents were removed from the settlements in Gaza in a unilateral move initiated by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

Hershkovits was born in Montreal and is the middle of three children. His family lives in the eastern Cote des Neiges district and prays at the Young Israel of Montreal synagogue. He graduated from Yeshiva Gedola of Montreal and attended Vanier College.

He once led the Montreal chapter of the New Kach Movement, a spinoff of the Kahane Chai Movement, that is now on both the U.S. and Canadian terrorist lists.

Gaza exit near completion

Israel Defence Forces troops completed the evacuation of military facilities in the Gaza Strip on Friday morning, ahead of the withdrawal from the Strip expected by Tuesday. The only building remaining is that of the division headquarters, which will be handed over to the Palestinians. Israel will create an extensive system of border crossings and terminals for the passage of people and goods. When it is completed, it will consist of 33 crossing points between Israel and the West Bank and two or three between Israel and the Gaza Strip.

Rabbi blames Katrina on Gaza withdrawal

A leading Israeli rabbi said Hurricane Katrina was God's way of punishing U.S. President George W. Bush for supporting the Gaza Strip withdrawal. "Bush was behind the Gush Katif expulsion," Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, founder of the powerful religious political movement Shas, said in his weekly sermon, referring to the main Gaza settlement bloc. Katrina "was God's retribution," Rabbi Yosef said.

Tourism up in Jerusalem

Jerusalem hosted a million visitors this summer. The Jerusalem Municipality said that visits this summer by both foreigners and Israelis were up as much as 84 per cent over last year. Especially popular attractions were the new museum at Yad Vashem and the Israel Museum, which is celebrating its 40th anniversary. Mayor Uri Lupolianski pledged that the municipality will work to encourage the trend during the coming year.

Tremor hits Holy Land

A mild earthquake shook Israel and the West Bank last week. The tremor, measuring 3.7 on the Richter scale, was felt in the Jordan Valley and Tel Aviv but caused no damage. It coincided with the publication of an interministerial report on the lack of earthquake preparedness in Israel. According to the study, more than 50,000 structures in Israel would not be expected to withstand a serious tremor. Reinforcing schools alone for a possible catastrophe would cost more than $4 billion, the report said. National Infrastructure Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer said he would table legislation to address the lack of preparedness.

Israel could use mortars too

Israel hinted that it could respond in kind to future Palestinian shelling from the Gaza Strip. "We also have mortars," the army's chief of staff, Lt.- Gen. Dan Halutz, told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee when asked about cross-border mortar fire from Gaza. Halutz recommended that Israel "reassess" its responses to Palestinian terrorism from Gaza after it completes its withdrawal from the area. Previous military actions have been pinpoint ground and air strikes, but Israeli officials have suggested that artillery be incorporated to avoid risking personnel in Gaza in the future.

Abbas cancels UN trip, imminent chaos in Gaza

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas called off a trip to the United Nations, citing mounting chaos in the PA. Abbas was to attend the opening of the United Nations General Assembly, an event that would have allowed him to hold talks on the sidelines with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. But Abbas called off the trip after Gaza Strip gunmen assassinated a former PA security chief, Moussa Arafat. Abbas is under pressure to demonstrate that he can rein in chaos in Gaza as Israel completes its withdrawal from the territory.

Israel helps stop hooligans

Israeli technology is helping the Netherlands fight soccer hooliganism. Dutch authorities announced this month that they will test voice verification software, developed by Israeli firm Dmatec, as a means of keeping fans with a history of violence away from soccer stadiums. Hooligans in Amsterdam, Rotterdam and Arnhem who have been placed under house arrest will be called before games begin and required to say prearranged sentences. The computer program will confirm the speaker's identity.

PA begins demolition of empty Gaza synagogues

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

GAZA — A Palestinian Authority bulldozer began knocking down the walls of an empty synagogue in the evacuated Gaza settlement of Netzarim on Monday, in the first sign that the PA intends to raze the structures left behind by Israel after its pullout from the Strip.

The move came a few hours after the Israel Defence Forces withdrew from the Gaza Strip, ending 38 years of Israeli military rule.

Crowds earlier set fire to four of the 19 synagogues Israel had left behind after its pullout from Gaza. The fires – in Netzarim, Neveh Dekalim, Morag and Kfar Darom – caused little structural damage in the fortress-like concrete and stone structures that PA President Mahmoud Abbas said would be destroyed.

The Prime Minister's Office said Monday that the PA must act to prevent the "acts of arson."

"Israel expects the Palestinian Authority to maintain the dignity of the structures of the synagogues," said David Baker, an official in the PMO. "Unfortunately, that has not occurred, and the PA is expected to take the necessary steps to prevent these acts of arson."

Abbas has previously said the synagogues would be demolished, and reiterated Monday that he does not consider the synagogues holy sites because they have been emptied of sacred objects.

"They left empty buildings that used to be temples, but they removed all the religious symbols, and they are no longer religious places," he said.

As the settlers left their homes last month, they took the Torah scrolls from the synagogues, as well as prayer books and other holy items.

Before dawn Monday, Palestinian gunmen climbed on the roof of the Netzarim synagogue and raised the flags of militant groups. They chanted, "God is great" and "We don't want anything to remind us of the occupation."

They then set the Netzarim synagogue ablaze.

Palestinian police stood by and watched, admitting they were outnumbered by the crowds and had little motivation to stop them. An officer who refused to give his name said, "The people have the right to do what they are doing."

Israeli Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom on Monday called the Palestinian desecration of abandoned Gaza Strip synagogues a "barbaric act" by individuals with no respect for holy sites, Israel Radio reported.

The comments came a day after the cabinet reversed an earlier decision and said the IDF should withdraw without demolishing the synagogues.

Shalom was a prominent supporter of leaving the synagogues intact, even though security officials had said they expected the Palestinians to demolish the buildings. Opponents of the demolition, including Israel's chief rabbis, said Israel must not be responsible for the destruction, no matter what the Palestinians do.

Last year, the cabinet ruled that the synagogues would be torn down. Since the evacuation of the settlers, however, rabbis have mounted a high-profile campaign to save the buildings, demanding that the government arrange for the structures to be protected by the Palestinians or by international organizations. On Sunday, the cabinet reversed its decision, voting 14-2 against the destruction of the synagogues.

The United States issued a statement criticizing the Israeli reversal of policy, complaining that it put the Palestinians in a position in which "it may be criticized for whatever it does."

Thousands of celebrating Palestinians swamped Neveh Dekalim early Monday just after IDF soldiers withdrew, setting fire to a building that only last month had served as a rabbinical college.

There were similar scenes throughout Gaza, as Palestinians headed straight for the empty synagogues Israel had left intact.

Flames shot up from the synagogue building in the isolated former settlement of Morag in southern Gaza, minutes after Israeli soldiers left and hundreds of Palestinians stormed in.

"They [Israelis] destroyed our homes and our mosques," said a man who gave his name as Abu Ahmed. "Today it is our turn to destroy theirs."

In Neveh Dekalim, gunmen from several militant factions stormed through the settlement, with some planting a flag of the ruling Fatah movement on the roof of the seminary as others set a fire inside.

The synagogue buildings were a focus of Palestinian anger after 38 years of Israeli military rule, primarily because they were among the few buildings left standing. Shortly after removing the last of the settlers two weeks ago, Israel sent in bulldozers to level the houses, leaving only a few public buildings and the synagogues

Israel TV said crowds of Palestinians entered Kfar Darom in central Gaza and set several fires, including in the synagogue, scene of the harshest resistance to the pullout by settlers and their supporters.

Israel ends the Gaza era

But there were also reminders of the difficulties that lay ahead.

Israel held the ceremony Sunday marking its official withdrawal from Gaza. But a ceremony scheduled for earlier Sunday was cancelled after the Palestinian Authority (PA) boycotted the event.

The boycott came after the Israeli cabinet reversed a decision and voted 14-2 not to raze about two dozen synagogues in Gaza. Palestinian officials were reportedly upset that the decision put them in the position of having to destroy the synagogues.

Also, shortly before the Israeli ceremony began, an exchange of gunfire between Israeli soldiers and what appeared to be Palestinian snipers was heard as several hundred children from the neighbouring Palestinian town of Khan Yunis tried to break down the fence that led to the military command post.

Earlier Sunday, army bulldozers smoothed a pathway between the sand dunes where an electronic security fence was being completed along the border between Israel and Gaza.

Elsewhere, cranes gathered scrap metal and soldiers burned refuse from the former Neveh Dekalim settlement that they did not have time to dispose of.

The smouldering trash sent plumes of black smoke curling into the sky. The cement bridge on a road built exclusively for Jewish settlers now lay smashed and broken. Piles of cement rubble bulldozed by the army lay where settlers' homes once stood surrounded by well-tended gardens.

Palestinians stood on the flat-topped roofs of nearby homes and watched the Israeli soldiers prepare to leave.

It was not clear what would follow once the last Israeli tank rumbled across the border back into Israel shortly after dawn on Monday.

Palestinians themselves fear some level of civil war as rival groups wrestle for status and control. Israel is wary of the possibility that Palestinian terrorist groups that have refused to disarm could gain the upper hand over the Palestinian Authority and launch attacks directly on Israel.

But reserve Brig.-Gen. Tsvi Poleg, watching the military ceremony on Sunday near the former Neveh Dekalim site, said he hopes the Palestinians will now focus their efforts on state-building rather than on Israel.

"The army can come back in [if there are attacks]," said Poleg, who served as the Gaza commander during the first intifadah. "But I hope the Palestinians will invest their energy in building their state and industry."

Halutz said he expects the PA to control Gaza in an orderly way and make sure that militant groups do not attack the Jewish state.

"This is their true test. We will not tolerate their ineptitude, turn a blind eye to their failures or ignore acts of terror. They will not be able to shirk their responsibility," he said.

One of the first tests likely to emerge is how Palestinians will treat the empty synagogues Israel decided to leave behind instead of destroy.

Cabinet members said they did not want to be party to the destruction of Jewish places of worship, even though the Torah scrolls and prayer books have been removed from the structures.

The Palestinians are complaining that the Israeli government has set a trap for them, knowing it will be difficult for the PA to prevent Palestinian crowds from defacing the synagogues.

"Isn't the Israeli government, in such a decision, trying to put us in a corner? Damned if we do, damned if we don't?" a top Palestinian negotiator, Saeb Erekat, was quoted by Reuters as saying.

The Palestinians, meanwhile, take issue with Israel's declaration that its occupation of Gaza is over, citing Israel's continued control over which people and goods are allowed in and out of the area.

In the meantime, Israel will continue to control Gaza's borders and airspace, citing security concerns.

Mideast aid: a Katrina casualty?

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

The success of Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip depends, all sides have said, on the day after.

But unresolved border questions, a climate of political uncertainty and even the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina have cast shadows over how the United States will help fund the next stage.

The United States may delay sending funds to Israel and the Palestinians, insiders say, because of concerns about the Palestinian Authority leadership, a wait-and-see attitude as Israelis and Palestinians both head into elections and discomfort over how Americans transfixed by Katrina's devastation will view money spent thousands of miles away.

Comment

Senior congressional officials from both the Republican and Democratic parties, who declined to speak on the record, said it would be considered bad taste right now to announce a major aid package in the Middle East as Congress scrambles to assist hundreds of thousands of people made homeless across the Gulf of Mexico. Some predicted a delay of at least two weeks.

Israel wants cash – reports have suggested more than $2 billion (US) – to help resettle the 9,000 settlers evacuated from Gaza and a portion of the northern West Bank, as well as to rebuild military bases inside Israel. The Palestinians are hoping for funds beyond the $50 million they received last month.

Larry Garber, director of the New Israel Fund and formerly an administrator of U.S. assistance to the Palestinians, said the "smell test" for projects in the wake of Katrina would be tougher.

Aid to either side could be questioned "if it gets into issues that seem extravagant compared to what refugees are receiving, if for example housing was made available to Palestinians beyond what we were providing to American citizens," Garber said.

Israeli officials say they're not concerned about the assistance for now, and instead are preoccupied with helping Americans made destitute by Katrina. A 40- to 50-ton planeload of supplies from Israel – including water, powdered milk, beds, blankets, mattresses, baby food and diapers – was due to arrive in the United States last week.

The aid Israel is requesting "doesn't matter right now," the official said. "What we've been focused on is how we can help the United States."

U.S. officials charged with disbursing aid to the Palestinians say they're watching how PA President Mahmoud Abbas spends the $50 million (US) he got last month in U.S. assistance before dipping into another $300 million appropriated for the Palestinians by Congress.

"Given the checkered past of the Palestinians, there's a sense of guardedness" about disbursing the money, one administration official said on condition of anonymity. That reflects not a lack of confidence in Abbas, but concerns about the limitations he faces, the official said.

U.S. officials are concerned Abbas is not doing enough to contain terror groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad. Hamas, which has distributed propaganda suggesting that Israel pulled out because of Hamas terrorist attacks, says it will observe a ceasefire only until the beginning of 2006.

"The administration is caught between these two challenges," Garber said. "One is to learn the lessons from U.S. experience not to invest money until conditions are right with security, the movement of people and goods, and internal good-governance conditions.

"On the other hand," he continued, "there is a desire to be associated with moving the process forward, and the easiest thing for the administration is to announce that money was being made available."

In addition to the $50 million already sent to the Palestinians, the United States also is committed to building a water carrier for Gaza, a commitment that Garber estimated ultimately will run to at least $50 million more.

Another concern is that, despite the conclusion of the Gaza settlement evacuation, the withdrawal is not formally complete, since Israel, the Palestinians and Egypt have yet to finalize control of the borders. The Palestinians want control of the Rafah-Gaza crossing, while Israel already is building a new crossing adjacent to Gaza and is insisting that it maintain control of goods and human traffic as a security measure.

James Wolfensohn, the former World Bank president appointed as the chief envoy to the region from the "Quartet" – the diplomatic grouping of the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations that is driving the Israeli-Palestinian peace process based on its "road map" peace plan – is in the region trying to accelerate a conclusion to the issue.

Blair advisers urge that U.K. cancel Holocaust Day

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Advisers appointed by British Prime Minister Tony Blair are proposing that Britain get rid of Holocaust Memorial Day because Muslims find it offensive, the British Sunday Times reported.

The draft proposals – which provoked a backlash from British Jewish leaders – want to replace Holocaust Memorial Day with a Genocide Day that would include recognition of Muslim deaths in the West Bank and Gaza, Chechnya and Bosnia, the Times said.

A Home Office spokesperson said it would consider the proposals, but said it regarded the Holocaust as a "defining tragedy in European history," according to the report.

"The very name Holocaust Memorial Day sounds too exclusive to many young Muslims," a member of one of the committees was quoted as saying. "It sends out the wrong signals: that the lives of one people are to be remembered more than others. It's a grievance that extremists are able to exploit."

The recommendations, which will be submitted to Blair Sept. 22, were prepared by four committees Blair appointed after the London bombings in an effort to combat extremism.

"There are 500 Palestinian towns and villages that have been wiped out over the years," Ibrahim Hewitt, chair of the charity Interpal, told the Times. "That's pretty genocidal to me."

Mike Whine, a director of Britain's Jewish Board of Deputies, said the group would fight the proposal.

"Of course, we will oppose this move," he told the Times. "The whole point is to remember the darkest day of modern history."

"These Muslim groups should stop trying to evade the enormity of the Holocaust," said Louise Ellman, Labor MP for Liverpool Riverside and a Holocaust Memorial trustee.

Britain's Holocaust Memorial Day was first held in January 2001, and has been held on Jan. 27 every year since then.

Eastern and northern Gaza still 'occupied': Abbas

BY EVELYN GORDON
The Jerusalem Post

Analysis

If anyone thought that Israel's withdrawal from Gaza would revive prospects for peace, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas scotched that notion nearly two weeks ago. Full withdrawal to the pre-1967 lines is insufficient, he declared: Israel must also concede additional territory inside these lines.

Specifically, Abbas demanded land north and east of the Gaza Strip. This land was indeed on the Arab side of the 1949 armistice lines, but Egypt, which controlled Gaza at the time, traded it to Israel in 1950 in exchange for a larger chunk of land that Israel held in eastern Gaza. This new border was subsequently acknowledged not only by UN Resolution 242, but also by the Oslo accords, which the Palestinians signed. The PA, therefore, has no conceivable claim to this land: not only did Israel "purchase" it by ceding a larger bit of land to Gaza, but the new border was recognized by both the UN and the PA itself.

Thus when PA officials first raised this demand in talks with Israel several weeks ago, Israeli officials dismissed it as a negotiating ploy. But what Abbas did nearly two weeks ago is not so easily dismissed: in an interview published in a major Palestinian daily, Al-Quds, on Sept. 3, he told the Palestinian public that "the evacuation of the settlers, the settlements and the army from the Strip are steps in the right direction, but it does not mean the end of the occupation. There are lands in eastern and northern Gaza still under occupation… We need to renegotiate the details and get back to the real border."

This statement manages to undermine every major foundation of the peace process at once.

First, peace was always predicated on the idea that Palestinian demands are finite, and that once Israel meets them, the grounds for conflict will disappear. But in this case, Israel no sooner agreed to withdraw to Gaza's recognized international border than the PA produced a new territorial demand – one it had never raised before – and began mobilizing Palestinian public opinion behind it.

Second, any treaty requires confidence that once an agreement is signed, the issue is closed. But in this case, the PA, which consented to the current Gaza-Israel border in the Oslo accords, is now blithely demanding that the issue be renegotiated.

Third, the peace process relied on the assumption that even if parts of Palestinian society were reluctant to end the conflict, their leaders would educate them toward reconciliation. Instead, the "moderate" Abbas has done the opposite: by raising his new territorial demand publicly, in the Palestinian media, he has encouraged the Palestinians to adopt a previously nonexistent grievance, thereby making it harder for any future leader to reach an agreement.

Fourth, the peace process was predicated on the belief that most Palestinians do want peace. But even Abbas, the most moderate leader the Palestinians have yet produced, is apparently so unwilling to give up any pretext for conflict that he has advanced a completely untenable territorial claim in order to avoid acknowledging the end of Israel's "occupation" of Gaza. That indicates that his goal is not ending the conflict, but perpetuating it.

His claim is the more remarkable because the PA already has far more valid grounds for refusing to declare "the occupation" over: Israel's unwillingness to give it control over the Gazan-Egyptian border crossings or allow it to reopen the Gaza airport. Since control of one's borders is an essential element of sovereignty, Gaza clearly will not be independent of Israel until this issue is resolved. Yet Abbas' fear of allowing any pretext for conflict to lapse evidently runs so deep that he felt a need for a back-up excuse, however flimsy, lest Israel give in to international pressure and concede on the border-control issue.

Fifth, the peace process always relied on the assumption that the Palestinians truly want an independent state. Yet even the most "moderate" leader they have yet produced has now proven himself so loath to assume the responsibilities of statehood that, rather than welcoming Israel's cession of the Strip and using it to demonstrate the PA's ability to run a state, he prefers to grasp at any excuse, however untenable, to declare that the occupation continues, and therefore the PA is still not responsible for Gaza.

Finally, the peace process rested on the belief that ending "the occupation" would end Palestinian terror. Thus disengagement supporters predicted that Israel's departure from Gaza would largely end terror from the Strip, because the terrorist organizations would be unable to justify continued attacks against Israel from "liberated" territory.

Yet the man universally hailed as the leading Palestinian critic of terror has now provided the terrorists with a hitherto undreamed-of excuse for continuing attacks from Gaza: that Israel has in fact not withdrawn completely, so further terrorism is necessary to liberate the rest of the Strip. That is precisely how Hezbollah justified continuing attacks against Israel after Israel's pullout from Lebanon: ignoring the UN's unequivocal finding that Israel had fully withdrawn to the international border, Hezbollah invented a new piece of "occupied Lebanese territory," the Shaba Farms, and then explained that it had to continue attacking Israel to "liberate" this territory.

And of course, Abbas will not lift a finger to prevent the attacks for which he has just thoughtfully provided the pretext. As he reiterated for the umpteenth time in that same Al-Quds interview, he has no intention of disarming the terrorist organizations.

Everything is Illuminated is a hilarious black comedy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Three years after he burst upon the literary scene as a writer of consequence, Jonathan Safran Foer's resonant, quasi-autobiographical novel, Everything is Illuminated, has been skillfully transformed into a feature film.

Premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival, and scheduled to open in theatres here on Sept. 30, Liev Schrieber's pungent black comedy balances solemnity with a touch of the absurd.

As in the book, the central character is Foer himself, a staid young man and an obsessive collector possessed of the gift of self-deprecation.

Travelling through Ukraine's lush countryside in search of the woman who saved his grandfather during the Nazi occupation, Foer, portrayed with consistent understatement by Elijah Wood, discovers a universe completely unlike his own back in the United States.

Starchily dressed in a black suit and tie, and looking exactly like an uptight accountant, Foer's trip turns into a self-revelatory journey turning on the importance of historical memory, the slippery nature of secrets and the indelible legacy of the Holocaust.

Schreiber, in his debut as a director and screenwriter, handles these disparate, difficult elements with panache. Everything is Illuminated glitters with the sheen of professionalism.

He is greatly assisted by a stellar cast, consisting largely of unknown but indubitably talented actors.

Elijah Wood, left, and Eugene Hutz star in Liev Schrieber's pungent Everything is Illuminated.

Apart from Wood, who last appeared in Peter Jackson's The Lord of the Rings trilogy, the film is propped up by Eugene Hutz, a Ukrainian singer and lyricist, and Boris Leskin, a Russian theatre actor. They add immense value to the storyline.

Schreiber sets the mood as the camera in the opening seconds pans on a procession of faded sepia photographs of quintessential shtetl Jews.

Foer, depicted as a shy, budding novelist, arrives in Odessa on a personal quest to tie up loose ends in his family's convoluted history.

He is met at the train station by Alex Perchov (Hutz), his cantankerous grandfather bearing the same name (Leskin), and a band tinnily thumping out America's national anthem.

The Perchovs run Heritage Tours, which caters to North American Jews investigating their ancestral roots. Though they clearly depend on Jewish visitors for their livelihood, they have little regard for them. Indeed, Perchov the elder hates rich American Jews and constantly refers to Foer as "the Jew."

They are obviously oblivious to Foer's sensitivities. Alex senior plunks his snarling hound, Sammy Davis Jr.Jr., in his rickety Trabant station wagon, not caring a whit that Foer is afraid of dogs. These scenes are hilarious.

And the Perchovs are dumbfounded by Foer's vegetarianism in a country where no real meal passes without a hearty slab of meat.

In a terrific scene in a ramshackle Soviet-style hotel, Foer manages to convince a sullen waitress to serve him a meagre vegetarian meal. Of course, the Perchovs can't understand his aversion to meat, and that brings out further laughs.

The levity is heightened by Alex's clunky, unidiomatic English. When he wonders whether Foer has had a good night's sleep, he asks, "Did you repose?" And in another howling malapropism, he inquires,"Are you carnal often?"

Everything is Illuminated, though, is suffused with a streak of seriousness.

Tired of being called "the Jew," Foer raises the always disturbing question of anti-Semitism in Ukraine. Alex is shocked that Ukrainians might not have been well disposed toward Jews, especially during the Holocaust.

In another memorable scene, they find the woman who supposedly helped Foer's grandfather in his hour of need. She lives all alone in a cabin set in front of a dazzling field of sunflowers. Like Foer, she is an indefatigable collector of useless objects and bric-a-brac.

She leads them to an obscure monument memorializing the murder of 1,042 Jews in the village where Foer's grandfather once lived.

It is an illuminating moment in a film redolent of pure, precious moments.

"Tree of Life", an exhibition of recent paintings by Toronto artist Myriam Nafte, consists of a series of large canvases, vibrant with colour and texture, inspired by the early splendors of hand-painted shuls and illuminated manuscripts of medieval Jewish life. Using gold dust and rich hues of pure pigment on linen, silk and canvas, Nafte also integrated passages from the Torah into the canvases.

"The work opens up the past and reconnects us to the sources of ancient wisdom through design and metaphor," she said. "At the same time, it reflects our current interpretations of faith and what it means to be Jewish in this century."

Due for performance this month in both Vancouver and Toronto, Orchids features music and a cast of 10. Nadal JCC, Al Green Theatre, Sept. 13 to 17. The production was initially intended for the health care industry but interested parties are invited to participate in the post-show Q&A.

Sisters of Sheynville play Yiddish music that swings

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

It's not every day that a Czechoslovakian child star moves to Canada, and it's still rarer for that actress to start an all-female Yiddish band in her adopted home. Even Lenka Lichtenberg, a former Czech child celebrity, can't believe where her life has taken her.

"It's really been such a strange road," says Lichtenberg, who now lives in Toronto and sings in the Sisters of Sheynville, a six-member all-female group who mainly cover the Barry Sisters, once popular singers of Yiddish swing.

Lichtenberg started singing when she was eight, performing musical theatre with one of Czechoslovakia's top cultural icons, Jiri Suchy, or the "Leonard Cohen of Czecholovakia," as she puts it.

"He liked performing with a child star," she says. "And I got picked to sing with him. We recorded five songs and three of them were Top 10 hits. They still play them there."

But Lichtenberg's stardom wouldn't last. In her late teens, she decided to leave Czechoslovakia and move to Canada.

"I came to Canada because I lived in a communist country. This was something I was trying to get away from since I was eight years old."

Her adjustment to the Great White North wasn't easy though; after all, she was used to performing in front of thousands of adoring fans

"I grew up in the theatre, I went to bed every night at 11, I was always hanging out with famous people. It was very hard to be an adult and be completely unknown."

While the fans may have disappeared, her desire to perform did not. After arriving in Vancouver, she tried – and failed – at more than a few things.

"I tried all these different musical genres. I played piano and sang in lounges, had a very bad rock band and played on a cruise line. The turning point came when I visited Israel."

Growing up, Lichtenberg did not identify with her Jewish background. She says she knew virtually nothing about Judaism. In Israel though, she found her calling – singing Jewish music.

"I decided that I should focus entirely on Jewish everything, from my life to music. I started learning about Jewish music, but I was starting from hardly anything at all. After Israel, I started learning about Jewish music from records and then I started singing."

Her foray into Jewish music quickly paid off – she met her husband during her third gig.

"I was hired by someone for a simchah. They asked me to play the horah and I didn't even know what it was. I got the job anyway and my husband was there, we fell in love and then I moved to Toronto."

Moving to the Big Smoke only fuelled her desire to become more entrenched in Jewish culture.

"When I met my husband, I didn't even know what Rosh Hashanah was, I thought he was just joking about the whole thing. But I started going along with being Jewish because my mom was a Holocaust survivor – even though she never talked about anything. I can't let Hitler win in a way, so I became more involved, helping to undo at least a little bit."

Her involvement included going to synagogue, and once she was there she, naturally, fell in love with the music.

"Synagogue became very meaningful to me. I saw women singing and I said I could do that, so I asked if they would let me sing."

Her first cantorial gig was singing the Kol Nidrei. Now she's a regular contributor to the High Holy Days – her next cantorial performance is during Yom Kippur.

"It's gradually growing every year," she says.

About four years ago, around the same time that she discovered cantorial music, Lichtenberg was approached by Yiddish singer Isabel Frysberg, who wanted to start playing Barry Sisters songs. At first, Lichtenberg thought forming the Sisters of Sheynville was a bad idea.

"Isabel grew up in Yiddish culture, I knew Yiddish from folk music, but not this kind at all. I didn't do it for two years, but then I bought the Barry Sisters CD and thought this is really quite fun. When we started working on it, I wasn't sure that this was for me, but once I heard it a few times I thought let's give it a try."

For the first year and a half, Frysberg and Lichtenberg worked on vocals, trying to get the Barry Sisters' harmonies just right. Once they perfected a few songs they started searching for a band. They eventually found singer and piano player Fern Lindzon, clarinettist Kineret Sagee, bassist Rachel Melas and drummer Lorie Wolf.

Hearing Lichtenberg talk about her band, it's hard to believe she was ever averse to the idea of forming the Sisters of Sheynville.

"This is wonderful contemporary Yiddish music. It's different because it has a swing element in it. We bring a new perspective to Yiddish music, which is also why I think this has a lot of appeal right across generations. It catches people because it's so energetic and fun. The music also has a sexy appeal to it and the female presentation captures it in a special way."

Since their first show at Ashkenaz, the band has expanded its repertoire, Yiddishizing some blues numbers and trying to incorporate some humour into their set. They're even working on a Yiddish arrangement for Leonard Cohen's Dance Me to the End of Love."

Lichtenberg says the camaraderie that an all-female band provides is one reason she was drawn to the Sisters, but it's her other reason for joining that'll keep the band together.

"I'm happy we're an all-female band because my husband wouldn't appreciate me moving around with a bunch of guys," she jokes. "That's definitely part of the equation."

The Sisters of Sheynville perform Sept. 18 at Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning. For tickets, call 416-485-7007, ext. 0, or visit at www.kolel.org.

Toronto actor strikes gold in L.A.

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Although she is relatively new on the entertainment scene, Caryn Green is already making a name for herself.

"Many people are getting to know me, and that is very good," the 26-year-old actor says.

Originally from South Africa, Green is also a singer, dancer, writer and painter. She lives in Toronto but spends part of the year in Los Angeles.

"I struck gold on my first week in Los Angeles, playing Tulia, a satanic villain in last season's six-part TV series Revelations. It was the role of a lifetime," she says.

"I auditioned for the part in Toronto, and when I was down in Los Angeles, my Canadian agent called and said that I got the part and we would film in Prague."

One of the highlights of her stay in Prague, she says, was being there for the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz and "seeing it from a European perspective."

As well, she adds that although she has been to Israel many times, she was able to travel to Israel to see her grandparents, making this a memorable stay.

Green was born in Johannesburg, South Africa, at the height of apartheid, the government-imposed system of segregation.

Although she did well in school and was accepted by a prestigious medical school in South Africa, she chose to follow an acting career. (She had had her first acting lesson at age three.)

In 1996, she and her mother were the victims of a violent carjacking in Johannesburg. Green and her family decided to pull up stakes, and in 1998, they moved to Toronto where they had family and friends.

She attended the University of Toronto and received a degree in drama and psychology. While in university, she played lead roles in productions including Cabaret and Fiddler on the Roof.

Caryn Green

Green trained at the Equity Showcase Theatre and the Professional Actors Lab. She launched her professional career in the successful Canadian feature film Bollywood/Hollywood, which opened the Toronto International Film Festival in 2002.

She then performed in stage and screen productions, including Shakespeare's Measure for Measure and Love's Labour Lost and several short films.

In Toronto this summer, Green co-produced and appeared in a short experimental film, An Antidote Against the Dislike of Life. The one-person movie, co-produced with Juana Awad who wrote and directed the movie, will be shown at a number of festivals including the Toronto Alucina Latina Film Festival.

Green says she likes to play parts about interesting women. "This movie is about a woman divided in her belief system. What's nice for me is that I am also trying to resolve different aspects of my life – career and family, which is very important to me, to live in two cities – and how to balance them."

Asked who she would like to do or be in the future, she replied, "Barbra Streisand is my role model. I'd love to work with her one day. She is incredibly talented, incredibly opinionated and a wonderful director."

Green says Streisand has been on an emotional journey and she is looking for the truth. "For her, creating is to discover, and it is for me too."

Jihad ideology the theme of two books on radical Islam

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Islamic radicalism has been on the upsurge since the momentous events of Sept. 11, 2001. Barely a month goes by these days without a fresh attack by an Islamist group affiliated with Al Qaeda, which planned and executed the destruction of the World Trade Center in Manhattan.

Two journalists, Yaroslav Trofimov and Stewart Bell, have written vivid, diligently researched books about this menacing, seemingly growing phenomenon.

Trofimov, a Wall Street Journal correspondent, is the author of Faith At War: A Journey To The Frontlines of Islam, From Baghdad To Timbuktu (Henry Holt and Company). Bell, a senior reporter at Canada's National Post who specializes in terrorism, has written The Martyr's Oath: The Apprenticeship Of A Homegrown Terrorist (John Wiley & Sons).

A seasoned Middle East hand, Trofimov minces no words about political Islam, which he compares to Nazism and Communism. It is grounded, he observes, in "a totalitarian idea of purity, in this case of religion rather than of race or class."

Thriving on poverty and historical resentments, Islamic fundamentalism regards itself as "a magic cure" for the ills of the world. He points out that its appeal is heightened by the military intrusion of the United States and its allies into Afghanistan and Iraq. These interventions have led Muslims to believe that the war against terrorism is mutating into "an intractable, almost apocalyptic conflict between the West and Islam."

A keen student of history, Trofimov reminds readers that the widespread presence of Western troops in Muslim countries is without precedent since the age of colonialism a century ago.

Trying to better understand the currents of disaffection roiling the Muslim community today, he travelled widely, bringing to bear a reporter's eye for detail and a historian's craft for context.

In Saudi Arabia, home of 15 of the 19 Arab hijackers who crashed planes into the twin towers and the Pentagon four years ago, he finds wholesale rejection of Western ideas. "Not even lip service is paid to the humanistic ideals that have shaped the modern world since, say, the 18th century," he writes.

The kingdom's tradition of religious bigotry and violent zeal was contained as long as prosperity reigned. But when the bubble burst, the pent-up forces of radicalism – which encompasses a virulent form of anti-Semitism – were released. One wonders whether the recent surge in oil prices will have any effect on the situation.

Mohammed Mansour Jabarah

Tunisia, the most secular Arab country in his estimation, stands in sharp contrast to Saudi Arabia. Trofimov meets an intellectual there who stresses the need for Islam to reform itself and foster tolerance. Yet Trofimov has no illusions about Tunisia's authoritarian regime, which crushes dissent.

Exploring Yemen, he senses that the government wants the West to accept its crackdown on Islamic militants at face value. Yet most Yemenis are proud of the fact that the family of Osama bin Laden, the spiritual leader of Al Qaeda, hails from Yemen. He also discovers that a puritan salafi brand of Islam has taken hold among Yemen's Sunni majority.

Trofimov visits a radical Islamic academy, funded by Saudi money, whose official ideology smacks of jihad. Its teachers proclaim that virtually all Muslim leaders are apostates because of their dependence on the West and their refusal to implement Islamic laws to the fullest.

When he drops in at a "moderate" Islamic school, he catches sight of colourful posters in the lobby praising suicide bombings in Israel.

Tiny Kuwait, he says, has produced as many jihadis as Yemen, in part because its youth possess sufficient funds "to act out their fantasies" and partake in wars in Afghanistan, Bosnia, Kashmir or Chechnya.

Touring Iraq, Trofimov concludes that the Shiites' hatred of Saddam Hussein and their dislike for the U.S. occupation has given rise to crude and fanciful conspiracy theories.

These run the gamut from the allegation that the 2003 war in Iraq was planned by "the Zionist lobby" to the accusation that "the Jews" murdered former president John F. Kennedy.

Trofimov's analysis of Israel's fallingout with the Shiites of southern Lebanon is essentially correct. They welcomed Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, but turned against Israel when its occupation was prolonged. It was then that Hezbollah emerged.

A skilled reporter, Bell, in The Martyrs' Oath, confines himself to a Canadian jihadi, Mohmmed Mansour Jabarah, who was recruited by Al Qaeda to blow up the United States and Israeli embassies in Singapore.

Although Bell did not interview Jabarah, he talked to his family. He also gained access to intelligence reports about him issued by the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service (CSIS) and the FBI, and followed his trail from St. Catharines, Ont., to an Al Qaeda training camp in Afghanistan.

The son of a hard-working Iraqi Arab from Kuwait who immigrated to Canada in the mid-1990s, he was the perfect terrorist. He carried a Canadian passport – which allowed him to cross borders without problems – spoke fluent English and knew how to behave like a Westerner. Bell describes him as "the vanguard of a disturbing trend" – a terrorist who was born or brought up in the West, yet subscribed to the jihadist creed.

In this connection, Bell says that Canada has been used as a support base by Al Qaeda since the 1990s. Canada has been a source of money, passports and, of course, recruits like Jabarah.

Born into a life of privilege, he could have prospered in Canada. Instead, he squandered his inheritance, falling under the baneful influence of a firebrand Kuwaiti cleric who claimed that jihad was the duty of all Muslim men.

At 14, he returned to St. Catharines determined to become a holy warrior. His brother, Abdul Rahman, who was killed in Saudi Arabia, embarked on the same self-destructive path.

Jabarah started by raising money for Islamic fighters in Chechnya, just as his grandfather had channelled funds to Algerians and Palestinians. Jabarah's father, Bell notes, was not a terrorist. As well, Jabarah immersed himself in jihadist videos, some of which focused on the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Intent on becoming a jihadist operative, Jabarah went to Pakistan, and from there, to a military training camp. By all accounts, he was an excellent student. Jabarah met Bin Laden more than once. At bin Laden's request, he swore a martyr's oath to fight the "enemies" of Islam, namely the United States and Jews.

Jabarah, however, did not cover himself in glory. The plot to bomb the embassies in Singapore failed. He was arrested, and in December 2001, two CSIS agents flew to Oman to take custody of him.

Jabarah talked and talked, not holding back any data. He was eventually turned over to the Americans.

In conclusion, Bell writes, "The case of Mohammed Jabarah is one of those good news/bad news stories. The good news is that through solid counter-terrorism work and the sharing of information across borders, intelligence officers and police were able to take down a rising figure in Al Qaeda...

"The bad news is that he was just one solitary product of a global network that manufactures terrorists. The jihad factory that turns pliant youths into killers for God is in full production."

Chilling words, these.

Jeans for Genes to help raise funds to fight Tay-Sachs

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Mention genetic diseases in Jewish circles and Tay-Sachs will likely become part of the conversation.

The lipid storage disorder that affects young children is fatal. It is also highly prevalent amongst Ashkenazi Jews, about 1 in 30 of whom are carriers of the mutated gene that causes the disease.

While there is no specific cure for it, medical advances, particularly in screening tests and genetic counselling, have helped make Tay-Sachs disease's tragic consequences preventable.

It is precisely that kind of outcome that Jeans for Genes Day is all about.

The annual event, to be held Nov. 3, will bring together people from all across Canada to raise funds for research into genetic diseases like Tay-Sachs that affect children.

"People will wear jeans in support of finding cures and treatment for pediatric genetic diseases," says Allison Mindlin, campaign co-ordinator for Jeans for Genes Day, the primary fundraising event for the Canadian Gene Cure Foundation. "Our goal is to raise $500,000."

As part of the fundraiser, participants donate at least $5, for which they receive a Jeans for Genes Day pin, appropriately designed in the shape of two double helix genes symbolizing DNA, the building blocks of our genetic material.

This is the fundraiser's seventh year and Mindlin says it is truly coast to coast, involving people at work, in schools and universities, hospitals and much more.

"In addition to the [jeans event], an art auction will be held in Vancouver for about 700 members of the Jewish community," says Mindlin, noting the affair is by invitation only at the Elliott Louis Gallery on Sept. 15.

The auction showcases unique water-colour paintings and other works by the late Dr. John S. O'Brien, who discovered the enzyme defect responsible for Tay-Sachs disease and developed screening tests for it.

O'Brien was also a talented painter, and the proceeds of his paintings sold at the auction will go towards genetic research funding.

About 60 per cent of Canadians will develop or die from a genetic disease in their lifetime.

Some of the most common ones that affect children include muscular dystrophy, cystic fibrosis, juvenile diabetes, Down syndrome and epilepsy.

But there are more than 6,000 "orphan diseases," those which affect fewer than one in 10,000 people, and about half the money raised through Jeans for Genes Day will go to research for these types of diseases.

"We try and target diseases like diabetes, which are heavily funded, but also ones that are heavily underfunded," says Mindlin.

Once Jeans for Genes wraps up, the Canadian Gene Cure Foundation will seek applications for funding from scientists who specialize in childhood genetic diseases.

Recently, the foundation provided funding to Israeli researcher Dr. Eyal Grunebaum, who is working on gene therapy strategies in PNP deficiencies at the Hospital for Sick Children.

"Some of these childhood genetic diseases affect adults," notes Mindlin. "But if you target something early on, there's a better chance the children will grow up to be healthy adults... [That's why] we're pouring money into treatments and cures."

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. With the kids back at school, I am always at a loss in trying to figure out what creative and nutritious foods I can send them for lunch. Do you have any suggestions?

A. When your are sending lunches to school, there is one very important thing to remember before anything else – send a lunch that your kids will actually eat. The second consideration is, of course, how nutritious is it? There is absolutely no point in sending a beautifully creative and varied gourmet lunch that your child will either throw out, trade or bring home.

So, first off, consider your children's taste preferences. You know they should not go all day without eating, and most kids do not want variety. In fact, many kids are very happy eating the same one or two lunches every day of the school year. This actually makes your job easier, and if they're not bored, don't sweat it.

Next, look at nutrition. Are there some whole grains, whether in bread, dry cereal, crackers, whole wheat pasta or baked goods like homemade oatmeal cookies or whole wheat banana muffins (chocolate chips are okay of course)? Is there some protein – fish, cheese, meat, milk, yogurt, soy, eggs or legumes? Try yogurt tubes, cheese strings, soft yogurt, hard boiled eggs and chocolate milk. Finally, are there some fruits or vegetables? Again, send what they will eat. Some kids will eat veggies if they have a dip, some kids prefer fruit cut up, especially if they are little. And consider where your child will be eating this food so that it is convenient for them. Are they sitting at a desk or table, or taking it out for recess?

Lastly, remember again, it's most important that they do eat. If their lunch isn't as nutritious as you'd like, you can still make up for it at breakfast, after school and at dinner. It's a challenge, but it need not be stressful. Ask your kids what they like, take them grocery shopping and let them pick out some new foods. They will be more open-minded if the are involved in the decision process. Good luck!

L'chaim Retirement Home

Judy Cohen, Founder
Dear Judy:
I want to thank you, Esther, and your outstanding staff for how beautifully you helped my mother make the transition to retirement life. She is so happy with her new friends and the loving attention she gets from the staff. I am so impressed: the staff doesn't just "work" there, they really care about the residents and their families, and treat everyone with such dignity and warmth. L'chaim doesn't feel at all like an institution, it feels like a family. It was an excellent choice!
Best wishes, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

Survivor escaped anti-Semitic kids by swimming

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

For more than 50 years, Abby Beker has been swimming across Lake Simcoe.

Beker, a Holocaust survivor, will be 78 next month.

"I used to swim both ways, sometimes twice a season, but now I only swim one way because I don't have a crew who will sit in a boat for more than three hours," he says.

Michael Halbert, 49, has been swimming across the lake with Beker, from Little Cedar Point, just south of Belle Ewart, Ont., to Roches Point, for the past 15 years.

"The most remarkable thing is when Abby slips into the water and starts swimming and he doesn't stop or break rhythm, not even once until he hits the other shore," says Halbert.

"When I tell people that I swim across the lake, they seem impressed until I introduce them to my 78-year-old swimming partner."

Halbert recalls that as a child, he remembers "watching Abby walk down to the lake, don his goggles and disappeared into the distance. Now I'm thrilled to be swimming with him."

They leave for their swim before 7 a.m., Halbert adds. "Our goal is to be done and dressed for the morning minyan at the local shul."

Beker, president of a high-end sportswear and evening-dress manufacturing company, Beker Fashions, was born in a small town near Kovno, Lithuania, where he would swim in the town's river.

"In order to survive from the anti-Semitic kids who chased us, I had to learn to swim to get away," he recalls.

In 1944, he was in the last transport from the Kovno ghetto before it was burned down. He was removed with his widowed mother and two sisters and they were separated.

For a year, he was in Dachau. He was one of 3,500 survivors out of the 25,000 who started out on the death march. They were liberated in the Tyrol Mountains on the German-Austrian border. His mother perished in the camps. Beker was later reunited with his sisters.

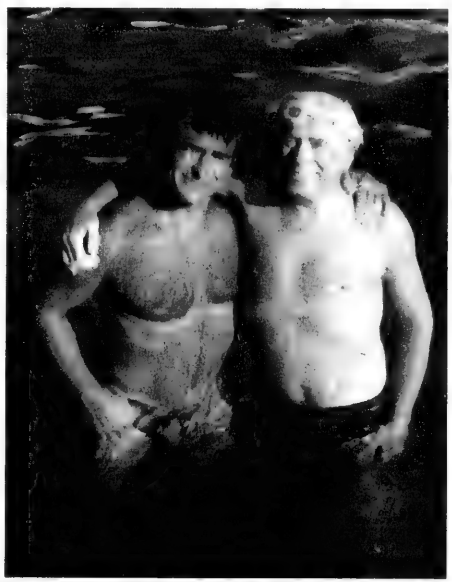
After liberation, he was sent to Italy, where he once again began swimming. He immigrated to Canada in 1948 when the Canadian Jewish Congress brought in more than 1,000 orphans.

"When I came to Canada, I took my swimming seriously. I would swim whenever I could," Beker says.

In the 1950s, swimming was very popular, thanks to Marilyn Bell, the first woman to swim across Lake Ontario. "I swam 22 miles on Lake Ontario with a full crew, sponsored by Ed Mirvish of Honest Ed's," Beker says.

He swam several swimming meets, one for the best time for 10 miles in order to qualify for the Lake Ontario swim, as well as a 15-mile swim of 50 participants at Owen Sound.

"Only 12 finished and I was the sixth to finish," he says.



Seventy-eight-year-old Abby Beker, right, and Michael Halbert, 49, regularly swim across Lake Simcoe, from Little Cedar Point, just south of Belle Ewart, Ont., to Roches Point.

Israel scrapes by to keep World Cup dream alive

By ITZIK GENISH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TORSHAVN, Faroe Islands — Israel got the points it needed to keep its World Cup qualifying dream alive last week, but it was far from convincing in a 2-0 win over the part-timers from the Faroe Islands.

The win follows a 1-1 draw against Switzerland in Basel a few days earlier.

The result leaves Israel in third place in qualifying Group 4, a point behind Switzerland and France, which both won last week, but have each played a game more than Israel.

Israel's final game will be at home against the Faroe Islands on Oct. 8, but even another three points against the Islanders will not guarantee it a place in Germany 2006 and its fate will be decided by the other results in the group.

The winner of each of the eight European groups automatically qualifies for the World Cup in Germany next June. The best two runners up also automatically qualify. The remaining six runners up qualify for a playoff round, with the three winners advancing.

Israel's best hope is to reach one of these runner up positions. France and Switzerland have 16 points from eight matches, while Israel is third with 15, having played a game more, with Ireland fourth with 13 points.

Realistically, though, France and Switzerland are expected to win their final games against Cyprus and Ireland, respectively, which would make even another win against the Faroe Islands on Oct. 8 meaningless for Israel.

In last week's game, against a team that represents a country with a mere 47,000 inhabitants and playing in the world's smallest capital, Israel was shown up on more than one occasion.

Avi Nimni and Yaniv Katan scored the goals for Israel in the second half, but it was goalkeeper Nir Davidovich whom coach Avraham Grant had to thank for the points.

Only a month ago Davidovich was the villain in Haifa's exit from the Champions League qualifying rounds, but last week he was at his best as the Islanders created several scoring opportunities in the second half.

Yossi Benayoun, Walid Badir and Pini Balili all had half-chances in an anemic first half, but solid defending by the Faroe Islanders left home goalkeeper Jakup Mikkelsen with little to do.

Israel came out more aggressively after the interval, and at 55 minutes, Avi Nimni made the breakthrough as he calmly sidestepped his marker and blasted in from the edge of the box after a Benayoun cross.

Nimni had two opportunities to put the result beyond doubt, but careless finishing from the Maccabi Tel Aviv midfielder left the opposition in the game, and at the other end, Davidovich was at full stretch to deny Christian Jacobsen and Claus Jorgensen.

At 80 minutes Adoram Keisi, Israel's goal scorer against Switzerland the previous Saturday, who until then had been quiet, made a driving run down the left and sent in a cross that found Yaniv Katan prowling in front of the home goal. Katan flicked the ball past Mikkelsen with the outside of his boot and Israel had its three points.

"It was a tough game, but the important thing is that we leave with a win," Nimni said after the game.

"For anyone who has forgotten, this is a World Cup game, not a league match," the Israeli captain added.

Grant echoed the sentiment.

"It was a difficult game, but that was what we had expected. Ireland had to spit blood for points here, Switzerland was level until the final minutes and France barely won. In the second half, we were worth more than two goals.

"The win shows how far we have come," he added. "Last time we were here, people were counting sheep. Now everyone is talking about us."

Faroe Islands coach Henrik Larsen said he was disappointed his team didn't score, but said that at least they made things hard for the visitors.

"We created opportunities, but we let Israel score easy goals. We should have scored at least one goal, but at least we made things hard for them," Larsen said.

Union head eager for time with family

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

After an extremely challenging year both personally and professionally, Ted Saskin was very much looking forward to some time away from the office when his kids came home from camp last month.

It was a well-deserved break for the newly appointed union boss of the National Hockey League Players Association (NHLPA).

Saskin, a Montreal native, who now lives in Toronto with his wife and four kids (including triplets), spent the past 10 months in the media spotlight, becoming the face of the NHL lockout as the player's association's lead negotiator and spokesperson.

Saskin, 46, spent countless hours hammering out a settlement, sleeping little while spending the last few weeks before a deal was struck in New York away from his family.

At the height of negotiations in late January and February, when it appeared the season could still be saved, Saskin was trying hard to get the game back on the ice while at the same time mourning his mother's recent passing.

Ted Saskin

"When you look at the type of details we had to get through to finally get this agreement done, it now seems like it was overly optimistic to think we might have been able to put this deal together in a matter of days," said Saskin, who joined the NHLPA 13 years ago and became instrumental in helping to increase its revenue from licensing.

He was named the union's executive director and general counsel on July 28 after Bob Goodenow stepped down. Previously, he served as the association's senior director of business affairs and licensing.

Saskin is a member of the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, he's raised funds for the United Jewish Appeal, and has been involved with other Jewish charities for a number of years.

A University of Toronto law graduate and a former intellectual property rights lawyer with the Toronto firm Goodmans, Saskin was well-prepared for the league shutting down, as it did for three months prior to the start of 1994-95 season.

"We knew for many years that this was shaping up to be a long and protracted battle," he said.

"From the outset, we knew we were going to be agreeing to a system where player costs were going to be dramatically reduced. We didn't think it was necessary or appropriate to have a hard cap system, but it was very clear that that was an overarching priority for the owners.

"We put together a list of the important trade-offs and were able to obtain most of them in the final agreement."

He sees his new position, which pays him a reported $2 million (US) a year under a long-term contract, as an opportunity to continue the work he's been doing over the years on behalf of the players – providing them with the best support services possible in a wide variety of areas.

In addition to more administrative responsibilities associated with being the head of the union, Saskin, like all fans of the game, can look ahead to a season featuring an exciting new product that the league will showcase leading up to the Turin Olympics in February.

He can also once again fade into the background as attention now turns to the much anticipated debut of Sidney Crosby and the coaching career of Wayne Gretzky.

"I certainly would hope and expect the people would be far more interested in watching hockey and hearing from hockey players than hearing from people at the union and NHL headquarters," Saskin said.

Words do count

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman, C.A.

Get it in writing. This piece of advice assumes that the written word carries greater legal weight than oral proclamations. Jewish law, interestingly, posits that what we say is much more important than what we write. This should not be surprising when you consider that our tradition is meant to be an oral one handed down from teacher to student – it was only due to persecution and dispersion that we were even allowed to put to writing our laws and traditions. The great importance that Judaism places on the proper use of speech – eschewing all forms of "harmless" gossip and insisting on clean language – is a reflection of this emphasis on the spoken word.

While there may also be historical reasons for this – until the invention of the printing press, obtaining accurate records was exceedingly difficult – psychologically, saying something has more of an impact than putting it in writing. It's for this reason that Jewish law insists that we orally confess our sins on Yom Kippur. It's not quite good enough to write a letter of apology to someone you have wronged. You must call them, or better yet, go visit them to personally state your remorse. The fact that this is so difficult for most serves to demonstrate the effect of the spoken word.

Strictly speaking, only oral testimony is acceptable in a court of law. Written affidavits can never be used to gain a conviction in a criminal case. Tone, demeanour, inflection and the like can't be communicated in writing. Thus, with minor exceptions, the get (divorce document) being the most notable, written documentation is no more than a record of oral commitments. Nonetheless, lest friction and misunderstanding ensue, Jewish ethics strongly advises that all agreements be put in writing. Jewish ethical teachings frown on loaning money without documenting the terms in writing and having them signed by witnesses.

Absent oral or written testimony, Jewish law follows local custom. In talmudic times, it was customary for employers to provide lunch for employees, and even the menu served was subject to local practice. Thus, an employee was within his legal right to demand steak over hamburgers if such was the norm at other places of local employment. Today, when most people in the business world do not have written contracts – something that Jewish teachings would suggest is not a good idea – it's crucial to accurately determine local customs. With so many different "work cultures," this is no easy task and at best can only help in providing some general guidelines. This information would theoretically establish proper guidelines in areas such as the appropriate amount of overtime, health and pension benefits, vacation pay and personal days. Absent a fully functioning beit din system, it would prove difficult today for an employee to enforce his (Jewish) legal rights. Nevertheless, it does provide employers with guidelines for the proper treatment of their workers.

It's in areas such as health benefits and vacation pay that we see application of the principle that in civil law, custom often supersedes Jewish law. Jewish law asserts that an employee only gets paid for work performed. It has no concept of paid sick leave, not to mention vacation pay. Why should an employer bear the burden of these costs? If a sick person has no means of financial support, then society as a whole must bear the burden of care, and if he does have financial resources, surely the employer should not be forced to pay for work not received. Nonetheless, modern day custom, and thus Jewish law, is that these are costs to be borne by the employer.

Katrina, God, love?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

The water poured into people's homes in New Orleans and again reminded us of the tenuous nature of our existence. Any second can bring joy, sadness, terror or creation; we just don't know which will visit us – when and how.

How heart-rending it was to read about the suffering of those soaked by Katrina. Did you read about the man whose wife slipped from his grip into the waters, as hard as he tried to hold on to her? Later, he stuttered something to reporters. His children watched him relying on his strength, but he had little.

I imagined her hand in mine – my soulmate, the one I love – and I was unable to make her safe; incapable of rescuing her. I considered what this poor, poor man must be experiencing. One moment he was a husband and the next second he was not.

What is life that waves of water swoop down upon us and carry away our children, our homes, our trees? What is it if not frequently angry and often very mean?

Where is God in all of this? Be angry with me for asking the question. I don't care. Many Holocaust survivors have asked the same question. I have heard this query from the lips of God-fearing people whose partner slipped away in other ways. We likely all ponder this. Is this existential challenge not inevitable? Is it not a requirement of our very own reality? Or is the real question, where are we in bringing godliness into our existence?

Katrina, leave us with something. It may sound trite, far too basic, but maybe Katrina's cold, fearless waves give us reason to love even more. I would not tell this to the man whose wife slipped away. Such comfort will elude him for many years. But to you, to us, whose lives are safe now, not drenched by the deathly drops of a mad hurricane, what are we left to consider?

If it is not that, if it is not the importance of clutching our loved ones even tighter – revealing ourselves to them and almost exaggerating the love we extend, then what?

Maybe the lesson of Katrina's hasty plunder is that the battles and wars we wage against one another are needless – a waste of human potential. It could remind us that while a flood of water can erase the existence of villages, cities, and pathways where lovers walked – humanity, bravery and selfless caring did not budge even an inch from its source. Quite the contrary. It was steadfast. Love leaped to its feet.

Is Katrina reminding us that the world is ours and that our inappropriate dealings with the environment are causing weirdness in nature and that it is time we stop pretending otherwise. The planet relies upon us. We need to take stock of our flippancy and latch onto beauty – nurture it, grow it. The environment will only forgive us for so long.

That image of the man's wife falling away from him and my sense of the insanity and angst passing through him scares me. It makes me shiver knowing the rain can fall again, here, or anywhere, and that hand slipping away may be mine or that of someone I love ever so dearly, ever so deeply.

Katrina, teach us something. Let it be that we can love more, and have it within us our grasp to fix what we have damaged.

Sir, we are so sorry for you, for us, that your hands loosened and you watched your wife as she left. We hope God has a plan for your family, and that it is a compassionate one. The waves came again, and then they left. What are we left with? What remains?

Martin commends Israel, pledges new money to PA

CJN News Services

NEW YORK — Prime Minister Paul Martin met with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon last week to offer his congratulations on Israel's recent pullout from Gaza, and he pledged $24.5 million in additional Canadian assistance to the Palestinian Authority.

"This is a historic occasion for the Middle East peace process. Israel deserves congratulations for its successful withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and parts of the northern West Bank," Martin said.

"Now, we have a unique opportunity to help Palestinians work toward a lasting prosperity and peace by partnering with the Palestinian Authority to help build a better, more secure society," said Martin, who along with Sharon was in New York with about 170 other world leaders for a three-day session to mark the United Nation's 60th anniversary.

Martin added that the coming months will be critical as the PA works to build the economy and public institutions in the West Bank and

Impact of sharia ruling unclear

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Ontario is refusing to clarify Premier Dalton McGuinty's recent threat to outlaw all religious arbitration in the province, including, presumably, the decades-old beit din (rabbinical court).

While Jewish officials were stunned by the premier's unexpected announcement, made to Canadian Press on a Sunday afternoon earlier this month, with some of them mulling legal challenges, others remained more sanguine. They say the ban is not a blanket one and that most of the functions of the beit din will be kept intact.

But there are also concerns that the premier may take away the legal authority that beit din decisions have had since 1991, when Ontario's Arbitration Act, in order to take pressure off courts, rendered all private arbitrators' rulings legally binding and enforceable in a secular court, provided both parties consented.

The worry is that withdrawing legal backing for the beit din would make its decisions much harder to enforce.

The CJN's request to interview McGuinty and ask him to explain how his move would affect the Jewish community was denied. Calls were referred to Attorney General Michael Bryant's office. Asked whether faith-based tribunals will still be permitted to function, but stripped of the legal authority of the Arbitration Act, or whether only family law cases will be removed from their purview with all other matters left as they were, Greg Crone, a spokesperson for Bryant, said: "I have no answers."

Crone said that "all questions will be answered in the legislation. Until that time, there will be no further details." He said the bill amending existing laws will be introduced in the fall sitting of the legislature. In the meantime, "it's what the premier said."

CJC 'Historic': Dion

OTTAWA — The founding of Canadian Jewish Congress in Montreal in 1919 was among 14 people, places and events named last week as being "of historic significance for Canada" by Environment Minister Stephane Dion. "These designations recognize the vision of Canadians who built our nation and how their actions, the places they built, and the events they were part of have influenced the values we share today," Dion said. The historic designations now include 917 sites, 593 people and 364 events.

WORLD

Bush Goes to Shul

WASHINGTON — U.S. President George W. Bush made his first visit to an American synagogue as the nation's leader. Bush toured the Sixth & I Historic Synagogue in Washington on Sept. 14 before speaking at a dinner commemorating the 350th anniversary of Jewish life in America. Bush toured the shul and viewed a Torah rescued from the Dachau concentration camp. Bush has visited synagogues in Germany and Russia while travelling abroad, but had not been to an American synagogue since taking office.

Yiddishist Dies

LONDON — Yiddishist Meyer Bogdanski, a legend of Jewish life in London's East End, died Sept. 4 at 93. Born in Poland, Bogdanski served in the Polish and British armies in World War II, even as his family, including his wife, died in Auschwitz. He came to Britain in 1946. Working as a tailor and active in the Jewish socialist movement, he spent four decades composing and preserving Yiddish music and teaching at seminars worldwide. He performed poetry, prose and song into his 90s, and his most recent musical anthology came out in 2003.

Generals Face Lawsuit

LONDON — A left-wing Israeli group has filed suit in Britain against Israel's military chief of staff Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz and his predecessor, Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon. Yesh Gvul wants them charged for their involvement in the July 2002 killing of Hamas terror mastermind Salah Shehada. He and 15 civilians were killed and more than 100 others were injured when Israel bombed Shehada's Gaza home.

General Avoids Arrest

LONDON — A retired Israeli general almost faced war-crimes charges in Britain last week. Doron Almog, a former commander of Israeli forces in Gaza, flew to London to vacation on Sept. 11 but, after being warned by the Israel Embassy, decided not to leave an El Al plane and flew home within hours. Israeli officials said British authorities had told them a pro-Palestinian lobby planned to seek Almog's detention on charges of war crimes in Gaza. "This is reason for concern, as the Palestinian community can put out arrest warrants for any Israeli officer who served in the fight against terror," Almog said. In 2002, Shaul Mofaz, then Israel's chief of staff, cut short a trip to Britain for similar reasons.

More Security Pledged

LOS ANGELES — The mayor and police chief of Los Angeles have assured the city's Jewish community that a strong police presence will be in place at shuls during the High Holy Days. "We will raise our visibility to an even higher level than in past years," Chief William Bratton said in a Sept. 12 news conference at the Simon Wiesenthal Center attended by FBI, state and local officials. The day before, on the fourth anniversary of Sept. 11, Al Qaeda threatened that Los Angeles was next on its hit list, and a week earlier, three American Muslims and a Pakistani were indicted for allegedly planning to attack two shuls, the Israeli Consulate and local military targets.

CJC Launches Online Shoah Claims Tool

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress' national archives has launched an online resource to help historians as well as Holocaust survivors and their families do research or make Shoah-related compensation claims.

The site, called the Interpretive Guide to the United Restitution Organization Claims Files, is a joint initiative of CJC and the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany. It can be found at www.cjc.ca/archives/uro.

The site aims to help people understand Holocaust restitution claims documents, such as those of the United Restitution Organization, which was set up in 1948 to give legal aid to survivors seeking compensation from Germany.

Features include a historical overview of the restitution and compensation process, explanations of the many types of claims and their changes over time, and links and study references to help people get assistance in making claims.

"The compensation process is very complex," said archive director Janice Rosen. "We wanted to create a resource to make it easier for people to understand their family's claim-related documents and use them to find their way through the system."

Protesters picket McGuinty over school funding

Ontario premier presents award at B'nai Brith dinner

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

"There will be one law for all Ontarians."

Those words, uttered scarcely 48 hours earlier when he cancelled provincial backing for religious arbitration, came back to haunt Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty last Tuesday night, when about 100 demonstrators gathered to protest his government's refusal to fund all faith-based schools.

The noisy but peaceful protest lasted two hours outside the Sheraton Centre downtown, where McGuinty was on hand to present B'nai Brith Canada's annual Award of Merit to Canadian industrialist Frank Stronach.

The protesters – mainly children in Jewish day schools and their parents – slammed McGuinty for cancelling the Equity in Education Tax Credit (EETC).

Enacted by the previous Tory government, the measure provided some relief for parents of children in faith-based and private schools through a graduated tax credit.

McGuinty revoked the credit after assuming power in October 2003 and made the cancellation retroactive to Jan. 1 of that year.

Demonstrators also called on the federal government to heed a 1999 United Nations finding that Canada is violating the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights – and engages in state-sanctioned discrimination – because Ontario funds Catholic schools to the exclusion of all other religious education.

Among the marchers was Arieh Waldman, the complainant in the UN case.

An idealist and his ideals (1)

From the editor's desk

Perhaps his personality was destined by the name his parents chose for him, a constant bright star bending its light toward him from the heavens. There is no doubt, however, that Theodore Herzl Tulchinsky has lead a stellar life in pursuit of ideals and idealism.

He lives in Ashkelon today, along with his wife and their daughter, one of the Tulchinsky's three children. He recently retired from a long, eventful and highly involved professional career as a public health professional. It was my good fortune to meet Tulchinsky and his wife, Joan, recently in a mid-Toronto coffee and bagel shop. A book could be written about their lives, perhaps should be written, but alas, for now, this space will have to suffice.

Born in 1936 in Brantford, a small community southwest of Toronto, Theodore (Ted) was the youngest of four siblings. The late, renowned Rabbi Gedalia Felder was his bar mitzvah teacher, but as Tulchinsky recalls, "I was not a stellar student."

If the young Tulchinsky did not excel in his Judaica lessons, he was, nevertheless, a quick learner and outstanding student in other fields.

At the age of 18, he enrolled in premed at the University of Toronto. He completed medical school in 1961. While at U of T., the medical student volunteered and served in the Canadian Navy Reserve and spent his summers at sea in the Martimes, based in Halifax. His affinity for the ocean actually predated his university days, for in 1952, the teenaged Tulchinsky won the challenging Whaler Race in northern Newfoundland.

After medical school, Tulchinsky interned at the Jewish General Hospital in Montreal. He was on his way to England to continue his studies there when events and his highly defined sense of duty toward his fellow man turned the direction of his life's path westward, toward Saskatchewan.

The provincial New Democratic Party government led by Woodrow Lloyd had enacted the medicare legislation put in place by his predecessor Tommy Douglas. It was a revolution of public service in that province and, of course, the precursor for the universal health care that would distinguish Canada throughout North America.

But medicare's birth pangs in Saskatchewan were frightful and very painful. Doctors around the province went on strike.

It was not a situation that sat well with Tulchinsky's conscience or with his understanding of the meaning of the Hippocratic Oath. And as two of his medical school colleagues were already in Saskatchewan, he decided to join them.

Ted Tulchinsky

The newly created Health Services Commission posted the young doctor in Preeceville, nearly three hours by car from Regina, in the northeast part of the province, ironically, near the town where his father had worked in the 1920s.

Tulchinksy recalls his time in Preeceville very vividly. "The political atmosphere was heated," he told The CJN.

Near Preeceville, the social climate was doubly charged due to the fact that a few days before Tulchinsky had arrived on the scene, a baby had died of a meningitis infection.

"Things were extremely tense then," Tulchinsky recalled with definitive clarity as if he were talking about events of the previous week.

"In certain places, there was a red-baiting hysteria reminiscent of the McCarthy days. The potential for violence was very high. I kept a lead pipe under my bed."

The doctors' strike lasted three weeks. Tulchinsky stayed in Preeceville for its duration, practising general medicine and helping out in the hospital. At first, he encountered some hostility from the nurses and the staff at the hospital, but it abated once they saw his ability on the floor and the seriousness with which he approached his work. The young doctor was 25 years old at the time.

And he decided to remain in Saskatchewan. He went to Saskatoon to join in a new community medical clinic. A group of doctors had joined together in Saskatoon, more or less inspired by Sam Wolf, who taught social medicine at the University of Saskatchewan.

Young Tulchinsky's mentor in Saskatoon was former Montrealer Louis Horlick, a senior professor in cardiology at the university.

It was then that Tulchinsky met the equally young, engaging, socially active and committed daughter of Tommy Douglas, Joan.

The sparks of love were ignited immediately. She converted to Judaism and they were married in 1963. That same year, the young couple visited Israel and the plans for the aliyah that would be fulfilled more than a decade later were set in motion.

To be continued next week.

Alicia's mom – coping in an impossible situation

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In the month since her daughter Alicia Ross has been missing, Sharon Fortis has taken comfort in the good wishes of friends, the support of family, the outpourings of generosity from neighbours and strangers – and from the biblical book of Tehillim (Psalms).

Every day like clockwork, Fortis picks up a copy of Tehillim and recites two psalms, one for herself and one for her daughter. She chose Psalm 57 because it corresponds to her age; she chose Psalm 26 because Alicia "is 25 going into her 26th year."

Psalm 26:9-12: "Gather not my soul with sinners, nor my life with men of blood; in whose hands is craftiness, and their right hand is full of bribes. But as for me, I will walk in mine integrity; redeem me, and be gracious unto me. My foot standeth in an even place; in the congregations will I bless HaShem."

Psalm 57:2: "Be gracious unto me, O God, be gracious unto me, for in Thee hath my soul taken refuge; yea, in the shadow of Thy wings will I take refuge, until calamities be overpast."

The unexplained disappearance of her daughter from the family home on Aug. 16 has, she acknowledged, sorely tested her faith. "I ask, why did God do this to me? A friend of mine said, 'God doesn't punish. God is just there to help you get through the bad.'

"I thought it so many times. Why? I don't know why."

Despite her doubts, Fortis has found consolation in her faith and in the support of her community. On the second day of her disappearance, "Rabbi [Avraham] Plotkin's wife [Goldie] from Chabad Lubavitch Markham came across the street. They put up a kosher mezuzah with me on my front door. We did it together… and we put a new mezuzah in Alicia's bedroom. When things settled down, I found my late mother's mezuzahs and put them in Alicia's room."

The rebbitzen's support hasn't wavered. "Every Friday something [for the Sabbath table] comes from her. She's a sweet, sweet woman."

Plotkin said she visited the Fortis home soon after the disappearance. "We brought a little bit of Jewishness into the picture and it helped."

She suggested the mezuzahs as the prayer they contain asks for God's protection at home, during sleep, when you arise and when you are away.

She also presented Fortis with a book, The Power of Hope, which she said outlined the Jewish view on coping in difficult situations.

Plotkin is not alone in supporting the Fortis family. In the days immediately after Alicia's disappearance, food packages began pouring in to their Thornhill home. "Everything was homemade," Fortis said. "Everything had a note saying what family it came from, with their thoughts and prayers.

Alicia Ross

"I have a huge basket filled with notes, cards and prayers."

Just a couple of weeks ago, "a massive homemade challah arrived from a family whose son went to school with Alicia." The sandwich shop in the building where Alicia worked sent a platter of food. When they're not sending food, many families across the city have sent their best wishes. TV reporters have told her the stations continue to receive e-mails about Alicia. A prayer on a card was placed for her daughter in the Western Wall in Jerusalem.

"It's very comforting that Jews all over the world [are sending their] prayers," she said.

"I take consolation in the fact that so many people care and are good people. I feel badly for people because they feel as helpless as me, and there is nothing to do but to wait for the phone call and hope."

In the midst of her anguish, Fortis has tried to restore some sense of normalcy. Although she retired from her 20-year career at Gowlings, a Canada-wide law firm, she continues to do contract work and a few weeks ago she completed a report on the regulatory aspects of environmental law, an area she specializes in. She found the experience therapeutic.

Initially, she said, she couldn't leave the house for more than an hour. "I got edgy," she said.

More recently, she played a round of golf and found that at least for the four hours on the course, "life was normal. But I know life will never be the same."

Fortis has drawn support from people who have also suffered tremendous loss. Coincidentally, she became friendly earlier this year with Linda Kimelman, whose daughter, Marnie, was killed by a terrorist bomb on a beach in Israel in July 1990. "She's been extremely supportive," Fortis said.

She's also been contacted by Priscilla de Villiers, whose daughter, Nina, was murdered in 1991 while jogging near Lake Ontario, and who founded a lobby group against violence.

When expedience trumped honesty

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty can say he was in an uncomfortable, even difficult, situation having to decide whether to extend the umbrella of Ontario's Arbitration Act to family disputes resolved according to Muslim sharia law. We believe him. It no doubt was uncomfortable for him.

By all accounts, among governing Liberal MPPs, the women's caucus was unanimously opposed to the extension. As well, women's rights activists around the world – not only in Ontario – had also demonstrated their loud, public opposition to the possibility of state imprimatur upon the operation of sharia law in matters of family law. The apparent ascendancy of radical fundamentalist Islam in other parts of the world has made many secular liberal democrats nervous about its possible importation into our democratic way of life.

The premier can also say he acted decisively. For he did. Two Sundays ago, he telephoned a reporter with Canadian Press and unambiguously announced his decision.

"There will be no religious arbitration in Ontario," he said.

But he cannot say, as he did, "there will be one law for all Ontarians." Only in the technical sense – namely, that Ontario will be governed by one law – is that true. But in the deeper, operative sense, it is simply not true. And the premier knows it not to be true.

How could the premier be seen to confer rights upon some religious groups and not upon all religious groups? Politically and perhaps even morally, that would be wrong. Thus, he opted to ban religious arbitrations for all religions.

It was a solution that required him, in a move that is highly unusual, if not almost irregular, in western democracies, to reach back to retroactively abrogate the rights that the legislature had conferred nearly a decade-and-a-half ago, in 1991, upon those communities, including the Jewish community, whose faith-based arbitrations were enforceable under the Arbitration Act. He did so without any complaint or evidence that the current system created hardship, or was difficult for the government to monitor, or did not conform to public policy standards. Nor did he consult with the affected parties.

But this was not the first time the premier retroactively abrogated a group's legislatively conferred rights. The first time, of course, was two years ago, when he cancelled the tuition tax credit for those families – including Jewish families – who send their children to private, faith-based schools. He cannot say, therefore, that "there will be one law for all Ontarians," because in matters of funding education in this province, he has already ensured that Ontario law prefers one religion over the others.

In finding a solution for the uncomfortable issue of whether to bring the sharia under the Arbitration Act, the premier acted expediently. In doing so, however, he trumped honesty.

Israel and Pakistan

Jewish Israel and Muslim Pakistan have begun diplomatic contact ("Israel, Pakistan move toward 'engagement'" CJN, Sept. 8). Some Jews have condemned the move because it may vex Hindu India, but we should support it for religious and historic reasons.

The monotheistic religions of Judaism and Islam share many principles. Judaism has nothing in common with Hinduism. Unlike the minuscule number of Jews who lived in India, a major group of Jews lived and interacted with Muslims in Arab countries.

Some note that, unlike Pakistan, both Israel and India are democracies. More important are their religious ties, as can be seen in the United States, where the strongest supporters of Israel are conservative Christians because they esteem the Hebrew Bible.

Mahatma Gandhi, who led the struggle for India's independence from British colonial rule, was callously indifferent to the plight of the Jews persecuted by the Nazis. The first prime minister of India, Jawaharlal Nehru, also played his part in isolating Israel. It is only since 1992 that India has had full diplomatic relations with Israel. Unlike the Muslim countries, which have a stake in the Palestinian cause, and thus their hostility toward Israel, the animus of huge India toward the tiny Jewish state was gratuitous.

Katrina makes her wonder

I cannot help feeling empathy for the victims of Katrina. But as a Holocaust survivor, I feel very bitter. Yes, some of us survived incredible odds. But where was the world 60 years ago?

The United States established displaced persons camps where some of us languished for years. Even Cuba is offering help now for victims of Katrina. But when the doomed SS St. Louis entered Havana harbour, they would not allow the refugees to disembark and the U.S. would not allow the ship entry, either. The ship was turned back to Europe, where most of the passengers perished.

Even Canada did not want Jewish refugees. In 1948, the Canadian government reluctantly permitted 3,000 Jewish war orphans to enter. Even then, the Jewish community was responsible for the new arrivals, so they would not become a burden on the country.

Is the world a kinder, gentler place now? I wonder.

A disturbing trend in tzedakah

To reach a high level on Maimonides' "tzedakah ladder" ("Rambam's 800th yahrzeit," CJN, Sept. 8,) neither the donor, nor the recipient must know the other's identity. But I suppose I will never see a sign announcing "the anonymous Jewish community campus." This phenomenon is not unique to the Jewish community. One can hardly pass a university, hospital, or sports or arts centre without noticing the prominent name of the sponsor. Gone are the days when these names memorialized or honoured volunteers and leaders for their community service. Worst of all, today, many worthy initiatives remain unfunded because there is no place for the donor's name to be displayed. Pity!

A shivah protocol suggestion

I would like to share a few thoughts with your readers after reading "Shivah protocol: Take your cue from the mourner," (CJN, Aug. 11).

There is great stress placed on the bereaved family because of the constant flow of visitors. As such, the family does not have the opportunity to recover from its loss. In many cases, the family has the added pressure of preparing lavish breakfasts, which are more in keeping with the spirit of a party celebration.

The mitzvah of nichum aveilim would be enhanced and made more meaningful if the family was allowed to observe the full shivah period in the privacy of their home, while being allowed to attend morning and evening services in the synagogue.

During the observance of the private shivah, close family members would be given the opportunity to visit and console the bereaved. On the morning of the day that shivah concludes, there would be a special nichum aveilim minyan for friends and acquaintances wishing to express their sympathies, at the conclusion of which there would be a modest l'chaim at the synagogue.

At the burial, the officiating clergy would likewise announce that the bereaved family will observe shivah in the privacy of their home and that a special nichum aveilim minyan will be observed at the family's synagogue. The family would, at that time, welcome friends and acquaintances wishing to express their feelings and provide a modest l'chaim afterward. On Shabbat morning, the rabbi would announce the special nichum aveilim minyan in the way that engagement, birth and wedding announcements are made.

Sharon calls for compromise to end "bloody conflict"

This address was given by Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to the United Nations General Assembly, Sept. 15, 2005.

My friends and colleagues, heads and representatives of the UN member states, I arrived here from Jerusalem, the capital of the Jewish people for over 3,000 years, and the undivided and eternal capital of the State of Israel.

At the outset, I would like to express the profound feelings of empathy of the people of Israel for the American nation, and our sincere condolences to the families who lost their loved ones. I wish to encourage my friend, President George [W.] Bush, and the American people, in their determined efforts to assist the victims of the hurricane and rebuild the ruins after the destruction. The State of Israel, which the United States stood beside at times of trial, is ready to extend any assistance at its disposal in this immense humanitarian mission.

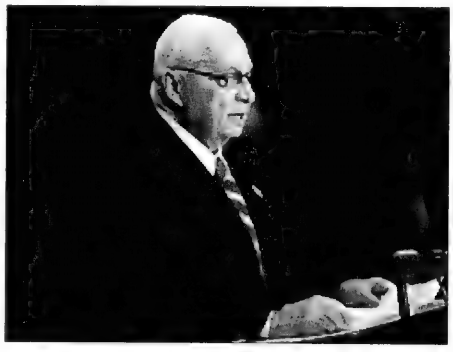
I stand before you at the gate of nations as a Jew and as a citizen of the democratic, free and sovereign State of Israel, a proud representative of an ancient people whose numbers are few, but whose contribution to civilization, and to the values of ethics, justice and faith, surrounds the world and encompasses history. The Jewish people have a long memory, the memory which united the exiles of Israel for thousands of years: a memory which has its origin in God's commandment to our forefather Abraham: "Go forth!" and continued with the receiving of the Torah at the foot of Mount Sinai and the wanderings of the children of Israel in the desert, led by Moses on their journey to the promised land, the Land of Israel.

I was born in the Land of Israel, the son of pioneers – people who tilled the land and sought no fights – who did not come to Israel wars, reach out today to our Palestinian neighbours in a call for reconciliation and compromise to end the bloody conflict, and embark on the path which leads to peace and understanding between our peoples. I view this as my calling and my primary mission for the coming years.

The Land of Israel is precious to me, precious to us, the Jewish people, more than anything. Relinquishing any part of our forefathers' legacy is heartbreaking, as difficult as the parting of the Red Sea. Every inch of land, every hill and valley, every stream and rock, is saturated with Jewish history, replete with memories. The continuity of Jewish presence in the Land of Israel never ceased. Even those of us who were exiled from our land, against their will, to the ends of the earth – their souls, for all generations, remained connected to their homeland, by thousands of hidden threads of yearning and love, expressed three times a day in prayer and songs of longing.

The Land of Israel is the open Bible, the written testimony, the identity and right of the Jewish people. Under its skies, the prophets of Israel expressed their claims for social justice and their eternal vision for alliances between peoples, in a world which would know no more war. Its cities, villages, vistas, ridges, deserts and plains preserve as loyal witnesses its ancient Hebrew names. Page after page, our unique land is unfurled, and at its heart is united Jerusalem, the city of the Temple upon Mount Moriah, the axis of the life of the Jewish people throughout all generations, and the seat of its yearnings and prayers for 3,000 years. The city to which we pledged an eternal vow of faithfulness, which forever beats in every Jewish heart: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, may my right hand forget its cunning!"

I say these things to you because they are the essence of my Jewish consciousness, and of my belief in the eternal and unimpeachable right of the people of Israel to the Land of Israel. However, I say this here also to emphasize the immensity of the pain I feel deep in my heart at the recognition that we have to make concessions for the sake of peace between us and our Palestinian neighbours.



Sharon at the UN last week

The right of the Jewish people to the Land of Israel does not mean disregarding the rights of others in the land. The Palestinians will always be our neighbours. We respect them, and have no aspirations to rule over them. They are also entitled to freedom and to a national, sovereign existence in a state of their own.

This week, the last Israeli soldier left the Gaza Strip, and military law there was ended. The State of Israel proved that it is ready to make painful concessions in order to resolve the conflict with the Palestinians. The decision to disengage was very difficult for me, and involves a heavy personal price. However, it is the absolute recognition that it is the right path for the future of Israel that guided me. Israeli society is undergoing a difficult crisis as a result of the disengagement, and now needs to heal the rifts.

Now it is the Palestinians' turn to prove their desire for peace. The end of Israeli control over and responsibility for the Gaza Strip allows the Palestinians, if they so wish, to develop their economy and build a peace-seeking society, which is developed, free, law-abiding, transparent, and which adheres to democratic principles. The most important test the Palestinian leadership will face is in fulfilling their commitment to put an end to terror and its infrastructures, eliminate the anarchic regime of armed gangs, and cease the incitement and indoctrination of hatred towards Israel and the Jews.

Until they do so, Israel will know how to defend itself from the horrors of terrorism. This is why we built the security fence, and we will continue to build it until it is completed, as would any other country defending its citizens. The security fence prevents terrorists and murderers from arriving in city centres on a daily basis and targeting citizens on their way to work, children on their way to school and families sitting together in restaurants. This fence is vitally indispensable. This fence saves lives!

The successful implementation of the disengagement plan opens up a window of opportunity for advancing towards peace, in accordance with the sequence of the "road map" [peace plan]. The State of Israel is committed to the "road map" and to the implementation of the Sharm El-Sheikh understandings. And I hope that it will be possible, through them, to renew the political process.

I am among those who believe that it is possible to reach a fair compromise and coexistence in good neighbourly relations between Jews and Arabs. However, I must emphasize one fact: there will be no compromise on the right of the State of Israel to exist as a Jewish state, with defensible borders, in full security and without threats and terror.

I call on the Palestinian leadership to show determination and leadership, and to eliminate terror, violence and the culture of hatred from our relations. I am certain that it is in our power to present our peoples with a new and promising horizon, a horizon of hope.

Distinguished representatives, as I mentioned, the Jewish people have a long memory. We remember events which took place thousands of years ago, and certainly remember events which took place in this hall during the last 60 years. The Jewish people remember the dramatic vote in the UN Assembly on November 29, 1947, when representatives of the nations recognized our right to national revival in our historic homeland. However, we also remember dozens of harsh and unjust decisions made by United Nations over the years. And we know that, even today, there are those who sit here as representatives of a country whose leadership calls to wipe Israel off the face of the earth, and no one speaks out.

The attempts of that country to arm itself with nuclear weapons must disturb the sleep of anyone who desires peace and stability in the Middle East and the entire world. The combination of murky fundamentalism and support of terrorist organizations creates a serious threat that every member nation in the UN must stand against.

I hope that the comprehensive reforms which the United Nations is undergoing in its 60th anniversary year will include a fundamental change and improvement in the approach of the United Nations, its organizations and institutions, towards the State of Israel.

Peace is a supreme value in the Jewish legacy, and is the desired goal of our policy. After the long journey of wanderings and the hardships of the Jewish people; after the Holocaust which obliterated one-third of our people; after the long and arduous struggle for revival; after more than 57 consecutive years of war and terror which did not stop the development of the State of Israel; after all this – our heart's desire was and remains to achieve peace with our neighbours. Our desire for peace is strong enough to ensure that we will achieve it, only if our neighbours are genuine partners in this longed-for goal. If we succeed in working together, we can transform our plot of land, which is dear to both peoples, from a land of contention to a land of peace – for our children and grandchildren.

In a few days time on the Hebrew calendar, the new year will begin, the 5,766th year since the Creation. According to Jewish belief, the fates of people and nations are determined at the new year by the Creator – to be spared or to be doomed. May the Holy One, blessed be He, determine that this year, our fate and the fate of our neighbours is peace, mutual respect and good neighbourly relations.

From this distinguished podium, on behalf of the people of Israel, I wish all the people of the world a happy new year. Shanah Tovah!

Rage against the status quo

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Even as you read this, you are asleep. But you're not unique. Most of us are lulled to sleep by a constant barrage of daily drudgery. We become thoughtless creatures of habit and allow the status quo to muffle our aspirations. Even idealists can lose focus and become fixated on mindless trivialities. We need to wake up.

According to Maimonides, the shofar's call on Rosh Hashanah is a sacred alarm clock, a call to stop slipping into the status quo. The shofar wakes us up and demands that we re-examine our routines. It reminds us to battle against the status quo.

Considering how stifling the status quo can be, it's no surprise that greatness is found in those who can break away from their past.

Jewish literature is filled with examples of great men who defy the status quo. Abraham walks away from his country, his birthplace and his family's home to follow his destiny. His journey leads him to become the father of the Jewish people.

Ruth, a Moabite woman, leaves home out of love and loyalty to her mother-in-law Naomi. Her grace and kindness find her a new home among the Jewish people, and her story is included in the Bible as the paradigm of compassion.

Akiva, an ignorant middle-aged farmer, decides that with enough diligence, even he can succeed at Torah studies. This bold decision will lead him to become the greatest rabbi of his time. These heroes achieve greatness by breaking away from the status quo.

Most of us will not become heroes like Abraham or Ruth or Rabbi Akiva. But we need not live in unending mediocrity. We, too, can rise up.

Any new challenge you undertake is a rebellion against the status quo. Any time you stand up for your ideals, you rebel against it. Any time you give more, volunteer more or care more, you rebel against it. Any personal transformation is also a rebellion.

I know someone who quit smoking cold turkey. Why? Because one day while watching his kids playing, he realized he probably wouldn't have the same joy watching his grandchildren. Something woke him up, and he could no longer stomach the status quo.

Dylan Thomas, in his poem Do Not Go Gentle Into That Good Night, insists that we refuse to accept the infirmities of old age and demands that we "Rage, rage against the dying of the light."

Truth be told, all of us – of any age – begin to decline the moment we become prisoners of habit.

Too many of us fail to consider new perspectives and new beginnings. That's why, as the shofar sounds, we must wake up and rage against the status quo.

A year of true national greatness

Gil Troy in Montreal

In Israel, the pre-Rosh Hashanah countdown has already begun, as signalled by, among other things, television specials recounting the year. Channel Two named two people "Person of the Year" – the army general and the police commander who orchestrated the bloodless, if painful, Gaza disengagement. Demonstrating the graciousness that helped Israelis write a heroic new chapter in the history of democracy, both dedicated their awards to the soldiers, police officers, settlers, and all of the Israeli people.

For months, headlines predicted civil war would erupt when Israel tried to remove the resistant remainder of Gush Katif's 8,000 Jewish residents, who rejected Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's unilateral gamble to withdraw Jews from the Gaza Strip and from four West Bank villages without any reciprocal Palestinian obligations to end terror. As the disengagement began, judging by the Montreal Gazette's inflammatory reportage about "the Israeli army assault on the Jewish settlers and sympathizers in the Gaza Strip," and the photos of riotous kids and burning tires, the civil war seemed to have commenced.

There certainly were some reprehensible violent outbursts against the security forces. Naturally, reporters showcased the extremists, reflecting the journalistic instinct to publicize the rare traffic accident, not the regular smooth flowing of superhighways.

But the real headlines should have emphasized the thousands who left angrily but peacefully. The most memorable photos should not have showed the hysterics who desecrated the memory of Holocaust victims by comparing democratic Israel's attempt to relocate 8,000 people with the Nazi mass murder of six million. Rather, the defining images should have captured the cooperation, restraint, shared emotion and mutual respect between the security forces and the settlers.

Long before the disengagement began, there were signs of nobility, not just hostility, and of democratic civility amid the bitter divisions. Hundreds of thousands of Israelis protested, with far less violence than at most European soccer matches. Preaching non-violence, settlers invoked Martin Luther King, Jr., so often some Israelis may think he was a rabbi, not a reverend.

In a remarkable, and under-reported, move, the members of many Gaza settlements held ceremonies handing their weapons to the Israeli army before the disengagement, even as many of those same settlers refused to pack. A week later, in one settlement, Israeli Army Radio reported that the remaining settlers prepared to congregate in their synagogue, wrap themselves in prayer shawls, and wait for soldiers to carry them out, to "create difficult images." Such antics, including the many people who shouted at soldiers while clasping their own hands from behind to avoid appearing physically threatening, were legitimate democratic moves – and represented a sophisticated, disciplined vision of civil disobedience.

Similarly, the Israeli Army and police selected their most mature members to evacuate resisting settlers. Teams of 17 unarmed men and women – when else in history have security forces voluntarily disarmed? – approached each family with instructions to ignore insults, treat the families sensitively, and pack their belongings, if necessary, respectfully. The security forces performed their difficult tasks with aplomb. One police officer told the Jerusalem Post that she helped peel carrots before escorting one family out, explaining that she approached the settlers as she would have wanted her own mother to be treated.

The Israeli media featured heart-wrenching images of people mourning their lost homes, and, most especially, of soldiers hugging them – often crying with them. One soldier explained to an orange-clad, kippah-wearing boy, "I have no other country or people" – echoing the famous Israeli song about their country's challenges and beauty, Ein Li Eretz Acheret. The boy repeated it. The two embraced and wept. One young soldier said on national TV, "We've been asked to take all the sensitivity we've developed over our lives and put it to good use to help these people."

Without sugarcoating what happened, without denying some of the excesses, on both sides and without ignoring the barbaric Palestinian response of torching synagogues as soon as Israel withdrew, it should be said that Israel demonstrated true national greatness this year. Next year, may we all mimic the idealism, civility, empathy, sensitivity, and true love of Am Yisrael that we saw so many of our Israeli brothers and sisters demonstrate as they turned a potential disaster into a shining moment in the history of democratic nationalism and Western civilization.

The price of democracy?

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Buckling under the pressures of controversy surrounding the possibility of permitting Muslim sharia courts to operate under the aegis of his province's Arbitration Act, Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty has acted decisively but short-sightedly. Rather than invite legislators, political thinkers, moderate Muslims leaders and the Muslim community to find ways to ensure that sharia courts comply with the letter and spirit of Canadian law and uphold the rights of women, McGuinty simply closed the door on religious courts altogether.

Fearing that sharia courts will allow for the unfair coercion of women in divorce and other matters, but anticipating accusations of discrimination should he permit Jewish but not Muslim religious leaders a role in arbitration, McGuinty wishes to bring to an abrupt close the successful relationship between Jewish courts and the government.

McGuinty argues that religious courts are inimical to Canadian values, saying, "There will be one law for all Ontarians." Of course, he is correct. That all citizens should be subject to the same laws is a fundamental democratic principle. At the same time, Canada guarantees its inhabitants freedom of religion. This means not merely the right to practise one's religion without government interference, but the right to identify with one's own culture. In Canada, we pride ourselves particularly on our multiculturalism, the idea that citizens may simultaneously affirm – and live by – multiple or mixed identities. One may be Canadian, but also Jewish, Muslim, Catholic, Hindu, etc.

And, as the debate on sharia courts has highlighted, these different layers of identity, or different systems of values, may come into conflict. One might argue that citizens who turn to religious courts – and particularly Muslim women who submit to the inequities of sharia, or Jewish women trapped by halachic inequities pertaining to divorce – freely elect to forfeit certain Canadian rights. At the same time, one must acknowledge that this freedom is compromised by religious devotion or by community pressure.

McGuinty did not plant the minefield he is now dancing through. The tension between conforming to the laws of the dominant culture while also affirming the values of a minority culture vexes the modern liberal democratic state. Indeed, the conflict between these two sources of values and identity – the state and the minority culture – has been an unsettling part of the project of modernity since its beginning.

The French Revolution of 1789 marked the start of the process known as the emancipation of the European Jew – that is, granting Jews full rights of citizenship. Count Stanislas de Clermont Tonnerre argued vehemently for according Jews these rights: "The Jews should be denied everything as a nation, but granted everything as individuals. We must withdraw recognition from their judges; they should only have our judges… It is repugnant to have in the state… a nation within a nation."

This formulation, which for many years governed the thinking of liberal democracies about minority groups, asserted a clear distinction between private and civic life. It cast suspicion on any Jewish institution that appeared to be an independent and autonomous entity.

As in contemporary Ontario, the regulation of marriage became a touchstone for the debate on minority rights. In 1806, for instance, Napoleon convened the Assembly of Jewish Notables to respond to questions about Jewish marriage and divorce, in order to determine Jewish loyalty as well as the supremacy of French law over Jewish law.

While the French Republic of Tonnerre's day granted Jews the rights of citizenship, political thinkers continue to debate the place of minority cultures. Is the bargain of emancipation such that Jews and other minorities, in return for full citizenship rights, must cede all distinctive elements of their own culture that are at variance with the norms of the state?

These tensions between the values of the dominant culture and minority cultures are embedded in the very nature of the modern democratic state. But the long history of the Diaspora has taught Jews to navigate the differing pulls of religious and secular law. Jews have an impressive track record in adapting religious needs to the norms of the countries where they live. Ontario's Arbitration Act has made space for a creative symbiosis that protects Jews' religious and civil rights. Rather than calling a halt to this successful experiment in politics and culture, it should stand as a model for other groups.

The Kirshner File

A critical look at U.S. policy in the Mideast

U.S. policy in the Middle East stirs a whole lot of debate. Admirers applaud American efforts to impose order in and bring democracy to Iraq. But critics contend that the United States is pursuing selfish interests and inadvertently fanning the flames of Islamic militancy. Washington's role in the Arab-Israeli conflict provokes a similar critique.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

These and other related topics are addressed by three books published recently: Resurrecting Empire: Western Footprints and America's Perilous Path in the Middle East (Beacon Press) by Rashid Khalidi; Understanding Iraq (HarperCollins) by William R. Polk, and The War for Muslim Minds: Islam and the West (Harvard University Press) by Gilles Kepel.

None of these works, which are thoroughly researched and ultimately thought-provoking, conform with the neo-conservative agenda of the Bush administration. Indeed, all three are critical of the United States' present approach to the Middle East.

Khalidi, a Palestinian American and a professor of Arab studies at Columbia University, is clearly at odds with the direction of U.S. policy. He claims that the United States has stepped into "the boots of the former colonial rulers of this region as an occupying power," and that its presence rekindles the Vietnam-era spectre of "military overreach and imperial arrogance."

He argues that its invasion of Iraq in March 2003 was neither a war to protect itself nor its regional allies. This is a debatable assertion, given Iraq's aggression against Kuwait in 1990 and Israel just a year later. But his dismissal of U.S. policy on Iraq as cold and cynical is basically correct. Prior to 1990, the United States had fairly close and mutually beneficial relations with Saddam Hussein's amoral regime.

Khalidi is downright skeptical of "simplistic" U.S. intentions to foist democracy on Iraq, a country that has scarcely been exposed to it. With some justification, he says that Washington's record in promoting democracy and human rights in the Mideast has been a rather poor one. Examples abound. Look at Saudi Arabia, Iran, Egypt and Jordan.

Khalidi doubts whether the United States can unilaterally rebuild Iraq, which he correctly describes as an "artificial state." The British "unified" what is now called Iraq after World War I.

If Iraq is to be rescued from the abyss of the increasingly successful insurgency that has claimed the lives of some 2,000 U.S. troops so far and reduced Iraq to the status of a failed state, the United Nations will have to step in, he writes. He may well be right.

His analysis of the western imperial penetration of the Middle East is reasonable. Western powers such as Britain and France bequeathed a positive legacy of scientific, technical and educational advances. Yet their subjugation of the area left deep and lasting scars. And as he points out, only a few countries, notably Yemen and Saudi Arabia, resisted the encroachments. By means of a divide-and-rule policy, achieved through the manipulation of ethnic and religious rivalries in places such as Lebanon and Syria, Britain and France imposed their will on the Mideast.

Khalidi's assessment of Arab regimes is equally unforgiving. Arab rulers have appropriated the flood of oil revenues to prop up a crass system of patronage and corruption, whether in "progressive" states or in conservative monarchies.

Until the mid-1960s, he observes, the United States acted more like an honest broker than "a dedicated ally of Israel." But since the Six Day War, the Palestinians have failed to gain a "fair hearing" for their cause in Washington. This is only partly true. Since 2002, the United States has consistently advocated a two-state solution.

Khalidi's appraisal of the Oslo peace process is sharp yet strangely myopic. He cites the expansion of Israeli settlements as a cause for its failure, but overlooks Palestinian terrorism.

Polk, an old Middle East hand who has taught at American universities and worked for the U.S. government, agrees with the prescient comment delivered by President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt on the eve of the war in Iraq. He warned it would create "a hundred bin Ladins" by engendering a new wave of terrorism in the Mideast and elsewhere. This is precisely what has happened.

Although Polk does not pay sufficient heed to the reasons why Saddam's ouster was necessary, his general observations are more or less valid. The current insurgency has become a "national war." The disbandment of the Iraqi army was a mistake. The attempt to democratize Iraq, while laudable, may be problematic. As he puts it, "Establishment of democracy happens indigenously or it does not happen at all. It has never been imposed... at the point of a bayonet." True, but what about post-war Japan? Without the U.S. occupation, Japan would not have made the transition from authoritarian regime to democracy.

Polk's observations on the current situation are of value, but his grasp of Iraq's history, both ancient and modern, is what really makes this book hum.

He reminds us that the propensity of Iraq's leaders for self-aggrandizement and centralizing power harkens back to Babylonian times. Sargon II proclaimed himself "king of the world," Abdul Karim Qasim was the self-styled "sole leader." Saddam liked to be called "hero president."

A U.S. soldier in Iraq

And the parallels Polk draws between the British and American occupations of Iraq are eerie.

Kepel, a professor of Middle East studies in France, reminds us that present-day Islamist political doctrine originated in Egypt. The Muslim Brotherhood, founded in the late 1920s, took as its slogan the phrase, "The Qur'an is our constitution," and derided both nationalism and socialism.

Saddam Hussein

American political scientist Samuel Huntington's concept of a "clash of civilizations," pitting Islam against the Christian West, is often dismissed as a fallacy, and Kepel is one of the skeptics. Yet Osama bin Laden, the spiritual father of global jihad and one of the founders of Al Qaeda, concurs with Huntington.

"The [holy] Book states it clearly," bin Laden has declared. "Jews and Americans invented the myth of peace on earth. That's a fairy tale." His right-hand man, Ayman al-Zawahiri, whose grandfather was Egypt's ambassador to Saudi Arabia, spouts an identical line.

Turning to Israel's struggle with the Palestinians, Kepel says that Yasser Arafat's espousal of the "right of return" stripped the Palestinian cause of most of its friends in Israel. He credits Hamas – the Islamic Resistance Movement – with having introduced Islamism to Palestinian ranks. Secular nationalists were in control of the Palestinian movement before the emergence of Hamas in 1987. He adds that the Arab-Israeli dispute was not a priority for international jihadists during the Oslo process.

He disagrees with the notion, propounded by the Bush administration, that the destruction of Saddam's regime would eliminate the real sponsor of global terrorism.

This is a thesis worthy of consideration. Saddam's interests and that of bin Laden diverged, though they both hated the United States. Washington undermined its case for intervention in Iraq by equating Saddam with bin Laden.

Stellar guest speakers and unique programs define GA 2005

Historic moment for Toronto Jewish community

By DAVID LEVINE

From November 13th - 15th, four thousand delegates representing communities around the world are expected in Toronto at this year's General Assembly (GA) to listen and learn and be a part of history.

The GA, which brings world Jewry under one roof to discuss relevant issues, moves into Toronto at the Metro Convention Centre with a roster of exciting speakers and thought- provoking programs. Among them is, Canada's Minister of Justice Irwin Cotler who will headline a forum entitled It Takes a Village to Repair the World.

Irwin Cotler

Dr. Deborah Lipstadt, professor of Modern Jewish and Holocaust Studies at Emory University, will speak about her experience defending herself against charges of libel from David Irving, a Holocaust denier. Lipstadt will moderate a panel devoted to the relationship between the Holocaust and contemporary Jewish identity.

Ben Stein, an accomplished lawyer, actor and presidential speech-writer, will be speaking at the opening plenary. His speech is just one of dozens slated to take place over the three days.

Ben Stein

Along with Lipstadt, Cotler and Stein is an array of scholars, politicians, pundits and laypeople, whose topics range from Will Klal Yisrael Matter to the next Generation to Developing the South and the Negev to Programming Bubbe's iPod.

David Horovitz, editor-in-chief of the Jerusalem Post, and a regular TV commentator, will moderate a discussion on the recent Gaza disengagement. Scheduled panelists include Moshe Ya'alon, former Chief of Staff of the IDF and Israel's Education Minister, Limor Livnat.

"The GA will be a unique and unprecedented opportunity," said Peter Ekstein, GA co-chair, with Debbie Kimel. "Delegates will become more educated about major issues facing the Jewish community here at home, in Israel and around the world, through some of the most dynamic and internationally acclaimed speakers."

"Now is the time," Ekstein continued, "for people to show their support, have fun, get motivated with thousands of Jews from around the world and become part of history."

To register for the GA visit www.GAtoronto.com or call the GA Hotline at 416.849.1000.

The first General Assembly (GA), in 1932, hosted only 300 delegates, the same year that the Council of Jewish Federations was formed. Seventy-two years later, the GA attracts over 4,000 delegates from 155 Jewish Federations, 400 independent communities across North America and several other countires. The GA is the preeminent gathering of Jewish leaders, volunteers and community, and it will all come together this November in Toronto.

The monumental nature of the GA can often be summed up by the inspiring guest speakers who address the delegates. Over the years, many Israeli Prime Ministers and American politicians have spoken, including Menachem Begin and Henry Kissinger.

"Whenever any of us who has been to several GAs reminisce about the most electrifying moment, it will always come to 1977," said Steve Ain, UJA Federation senior vice president of Integrated Development. "That was the year Golda Meir addressed the GA in Dallas, her last appearance in North America and it was just breathtaking."

Three thousand GA delegates marched through Jerusalem in 2003.

When asked to recall her most memorable moments from any GA, Gail Hyman, senior vice president of communications at United Jewish Communities (UJC), who is also heading up this year's GA, had to work hard to narrow them down.

"Jeffrey Schwartz, a leader from Boston, a younger fellow, spoke so elegantly and eloquently about his family, his connection to Judaism. That moment really resonated with me," she said. "I also was very moved when, at the 2003 GA, hosted in Israel, 3,000 delegates marched through the streets of Jerusalem."

"To be able to participate with 4,000 people who come from all over, from hundreds of different communities, who all believe in the same thing, who give their money, their time and souls," Ain said, "that is tremendously reinforcing to what we all do."

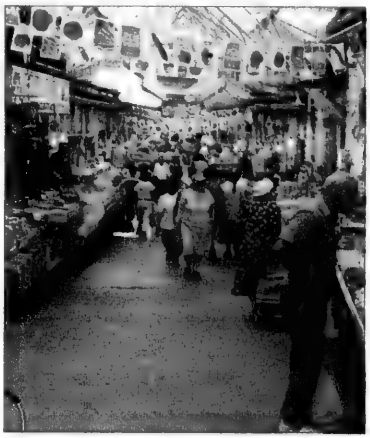
Market day at the GA

What's a gathering of 4,000 Jews from across North America and around the world without an opportunity to shop? This year's General Assembly (GA) at the Metro Convention Centre is being accompanied by a Global Jewish Market Place where delegates can stroll through a world of Jewish shopping opportunities and take a break from GA activities.



Ben Yehuda Street market in Jerusalem will inspire Toronto's GA Global Market Place.

The Global Jewish Market Place will feature Ben Yehuda Street West for vendors from Israel to sell their handcrafted Judaica, books and CDs. A highlight among the vendors is a shop of crafts, hand-made by Ethiopian immigrants to Israel. In addition, members of Jewish organizations from around the world, such as The Jewish Agency for Israel, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and philanthropic foundations will have booths set up to showcase their work.

The Global Jewish Market Place will, for the first time, be open to the public on November 12th, the Saturday night before the GA, from 7:30 pm until 11:00 pm at the Metro Convention Centre.

"We are so excited about the Market Place and being able to offer it at the GA," said GA Co-chair Debbie Kimel. "It will be a wonderful opportunity for GA participants who will have access to fabulous crafts, books and information. But even more, it's an opportunity for North Americans to buy Israeli good and support Israeli businesses. I am really proud of this effort."

The Global Jewish Market Place will also feature a stage devoted to entertainment from all over the world.

Shabbat at sea off Baffin Island

By SUZANNE SHERKIN

Guest Voice

It was an unlikely location to celebrate one's Jewish traditions, but as with so many memorable events in our lives, unpredictability can be a catalyst for clarity. In this case, the unlikely location for celebration was Baffin Island – close to the Arctic Circle – and the unexpected event was a Shabbat service aboard a small cruise ship.

The group of passengers was relatively small as cruises go – 55 eclectic souls from around the world. We had boarded a plane at Montreal destined for Kuujjuaq, a northern point of Nunavik.

I was seated beside Frank and Miriam, from New York, who were in the early days of their retirement. We acknowledged our common Jewish background. Later that day, I met another couple – also from the United States, also retired and also Jewish.

We were escorted through Kuujjuaq by a local guide. The remote town was dotted with simple wooden houses hiked up on stilts to accommodate the near year-round permafrost. Once at the water's edge, we took Zodiac boats to our waiting ship and began our journey northward through Hudson Strait, along the shores of Baffin Island.

That first evening, we were introduced to the group of naturalists who were to be our sources of information in this northern territory. Our ornithologist was Shoshanah, a twentysomething PhD student. Meeting her was the clincher. I was determined to publicly recognize this seemingly coincidental twist of the group's religious similarity. I figured about a third of the passengers were Jewish. Talking to Shoshanah that Monday night, I thought, "We simply have to arrange a Shabbat service."

For the next week, our days were filled with sightings of polar bears, birds, icebergs and whales, and hikes along trails of granite and Arctic poppies. The week was also filled with the buzz of excitement about the upcoming Shabbat service.

A simple idea had become a small movement of awareness. Throughout the week, I found myself engaged in conversations with Jews and non-Jews about the significance of Shabbat.

As Friday approached, we put in place our Shabbat arrangements – a bottle of wine, two candles and a challah. Arranging for the last was the most challenging. Having grown up in a family of bakers, I knew how to pull it off. I had the pastry chef prepare the dough. I crimped four dough strips at the top and started to braid as my father had taught me so many years ago.

Despite the high winds, 10-foot waves and shaky seasick feeling we were suffering, there was a small crowd at the service. It wasn't sundown, but midnight was just too late for us.

The table had been laid out beautifully by the ship's host. He'd rustled up a white tablecloth, two little candles, a bottle of wine and the challah. Perhaps it was my imagination, but it seemed to gleam with a kind of pride of place.

I welcomed everyone and spoke briefly about how Yiddish is much like Innuktitut, the language of the Innuit. Both are languages struggling to survive the generations of assimilation and integration. It was a fitting comparison.

I spread a napkin on my head, stood in front of the two tiny flames, circled my hands three times and began the brachah. Slowly, one at a time, people began to join in. People from all parts of the world, who had never met before, were gathered together in this wonderful moment of connection.

We all sang the benedictions in the same voice, with the same tune. We held the candles down so they wouldn't fly through the portholes as our ship rocked over the storm waves on the high seas. Our voices joined together… now over the wine, now over the challah. There was a warmth we all shared, a wordless understanding of our heritage.

Most of us were convenient observers of Judaism, and yet this makeshift service was more meaningful than any properly conducted one. It was clear that our connection as Jews is not so much about the correctness of our observance, the neighbourhood we live in or the friends we surround ourselves with. It's about sharing an understanding of our ancient traditions – respecting our heritage and bringing together a community to share a familiar bond.

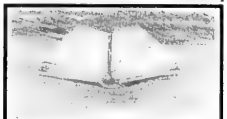
A time to mark transitions

By RABBI HOWARD MORRISON



Rabbinic Reflections

While the month of Elul is a preparatory month for the High Holy Days, it is meaningful to me for other reasons as well. At the Jewish Theological Seminary, where I attended rabbinical school, it is customary for rabbinical students in their final year to present a sermon in front of faculty and peers. The school officials draw a lottery to assign a Torah portion to a student. The parshah given to me in 1986 was Ki Tavo, which we read this coming Shabbat.

Many years earlier, when I was a day school student, my mother was being honoured by a local Jewish organization. The parshah that week was also Ki Tavo. She asked me for some guidance as she was preparing a dvar Torah, and from the parshah's opening verses, we developed an idea together.

The dramatic ceremony of the first fruits is detailed at the outset of the Torah portion. While the Kohen (Israelite priest) officiated at the ceremony, the Torah is very clear in explaining that each individual must be actively involved in the process – from taking the fruit, to bringing it, placing it in a basket, going to a designated place, and coming to the Kohen.

Each Hebrew verb is constructed in the singular to teach us that every Jew must find his or her place of individual obligation in supporting our tradition, our faith, and our people. This was the message that I helped my mother to craft when I was a young child.

Now, in September 2005, I remember my mother, of blessed memory, who died on Sept. 11, 1999, which coincided with the first day of Rosh Hashanah that year. I also rejoice the following day, Sept. 12, as I recall the birth of my eldest son on that date in 1994, which fell during the days between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

Having buried my mother and having become a father around the same time of year propels me to contemplate the seasons of our lives. The High Holy Day period, like life itself, commemorates transitions. An old year ends, and a new year begins. One chapter in the book of life is closed, and a new chapter in the same book is now open, waiting to be composed.

Many of us will celebrate the High Holy Days surrounded by older and younger family members. Many of us will recall, in loving memory, older and/or younger family members of blessed memory. One of my favourite verses in the Torah appears when Moses specifies to Pharaoh exactly who will leave Egypt. "With our young and with our old we will go forth" (Exodus 15, 9). Whether it be in a family, a synagogue or a community, we are strengthened when we combine the interests and energies of our young and our old. The former offers us renewed vitality, while the latter offers us perspective, guidance and wisdom.

"Young" and "old" can refer not only to people, but to the years that have preceded us and the new years still to come. May we cherish the laws, customs and traditions of our past and utilize them well in confronting the challenges of modern life. As one of my teachers said years ago, our challenge and responsibility as Jews is not to modernize Judaism, but to Judaize modernity. Let us not judge Judaism by secular western values. Rather, we should understand and apply age-old Jewish values to the challenges we face in daily life and synthesize the results as best we can.

The ceremony of the first fruits as recounted in Parshat Ki Tavo concludes with the verse, "And you shall rejoice in all the good which the Lord your God has given you" (Deut.26:11).

May we all find reason to rejoice with the onset of the new year 5766 upon us.

Jewish Life

Prayers and precedent

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

During the Torah readings for Rosh Hashanah, we read the story of Hannah. At the beginning of the book of Samuel, we meet a family that seems to echo some aspects of our ancestral families. There is the father, Elkanah, and his two wives, Hannah and Penina. While Hannah is the wife who is loved, Penina is the wife who bears the children. There are clear parallels between this family and the family of Jacob, Rachel and Leah.

Every year, this family makes a ritual pilgrimage to Shiloh, the place of the Ark and the priest, to offer sacrifices to God. Every year, Elkanah gives Hannah extra food and Penina makes Hannah's life miserable over this preferential treatment. One year, Hannah decides to do something about the problem. She takes her bitterness and her anger and turns toward God in prayer.

The Talmud tells us that three women were remembered by God on Rosh Hashanah, and those three women conceived children. Sarah, Rachel and Hannah were all challenged by infertility and each received Divine intervention and was able to conceive. Interestingly, each of the three women expressed her frustration differently. Sarah tried to solve the problem by introducing Hagar into the family. Rachel turned to Jacob and demanded that he give her children. Only Hannah turned to God with prayer.

Hannah is often used as the textual model of Jewish prayer. She pours out her emotions to God and she moves her lips while keeping her words private. But more than this, Hannah makes an offer to God that will ultimately will result in the outcome she desires. Hannah brings this proposal to God: if she bears a child, she will return that child as a Nazarite into the service of God for the lifetime of the child. In other words, Hannah is saying: "Give me a child and I will give him back."

It is an unusual proposal and Hannah does give birth to Samuel, who will, in fact, serve God in Shiloh and then as a prophet all of his life. Why would Hannah offer such an unusual arrangement?

Not long before the story of Hannah, one finds the story of Samson. In the time of the Judges, a barren woman is approached by an angel and told that she will conceive a child who will be a Nazarite and redeem Israel. The child is Samson and he serves God as a Nazarite for his entire life. The most interesting detail of this story for barren women is that the idea for this child came from God. The woman in the text did not pray to God for a child but was approached by an angel unsolicited.

Hannah bases her prayer on precedent. If God suggested this idea not long ago to another barren woman, clearly it is an appealing idea to God, and therefore Hannah will suggest it again. The aspect of precedence and historical dialogue becomes a key component to the prayer model Hannah represents.

As we enter the High Holy Days and we lose ourselves in prayers that reflect ancient concepts and thoughts that we try to couple with our current desires, we should remember Hannah bowed before the Ark, crying and turning toward God. Our model of Jewish prayer is a bitter, childless woman who has every right to be angry. But she takes that anger and includes it in her prayers, and then looks to history for an answer to her dilemma.

We have all stood in the place of our ancestors and our parents. No human dilemma is a new dilemma. We can turn away or we can turn toward. We all have Hannah's choices.

May the coming year be peaceful and sweet.

Rosh Hashanah humour

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Rosh Hashanah humour? Is this some kind of joke? Actually, yes.

Rosh Hashanah ushers in the most solemn period of the Jewish calendar that culminates 10 days later on Yom Kippur. This is a serious time of introspection and cheshbon nefesh, a spiritual accounting. But Jews being Jews, there's also time for a smile or two.

By now, you should have received your High Holy Day ticket-renewal form. Well, it seems several forward-thinking congregations are now finding it gives them a competitive edge to allow you to specify your seat location. Here are excerpts from one form I came across: [http://www.jr.co.il/humor/hh06.txt]

I want a seat located (indicate order of priority):

___ On the aisle
___ Near the pulpit
___ Where no one on the bimah can see/hear me talking during services
___ Where I can sleep during the rabbi's sermon (additional charge)

On the first night of Rosh Hashanah, there is a tradition to eat foods whose Hebrew names have dual meanings and are omens of an auspicious year to come. We eat pomegranates so "that our merits increase like [the seeds of] a pomegranate" and the head of a fish or sheep so "that we be as the head and not as the tail." [http:// tinyurl.com/88uvp]

Pomegranates and sheep's heads are fine, if you like that sort of thing. But here's one suggestion for an updating of the custom: "Cut a raisin in two equal pieces and place it along with a piece of iceberg lettuce in a stalk of celery. While eating this, you should say, 'Our Father in Heaven, lettuce half a raisin celery.' And I hope you get one for the new year." [http://www.jr.co.il/humor/hh03.txt]

Humility is an essential quality for the repentant Jew, particularly on the Day$ of Awe. And that leads us to the story of the rabbi who stops in the middle of the Yom Kippur service, prostrates himself and cries out, "O God. Before You, I am nothing!" The chazzan is so moved that he immediately follows suit, crying, "O God. Before you, I am nothing!" In the ensuing silence, a member of the congregation jumps from his seat, prostrates himself in the aisle and cries, "O God. Before You, I am nothing!" Seeing this, the chazzan nudges the rabbi and whispers, "So look who thinks he's nothing?" [http://tinyurl.com/azvnk]

Speaking of humility, here are a couple for the Jewish computer geek community. There's the story of the modest but ancient 286 PC that exclaimed, "I am but DOS and ASCII!" [http://tinyurl.com/d5m5p] And why didn't the computerized shofar work on Rosh Hashanah? The rabbi didn't buy enough RAM.

As for technology and the holidays, a baseball fan comes running to his rabbi before Yom Kippur and says, "Rabbi, I have a dilemma. The Sox are playing their big game on Yom Kippur. What do I do?" The rabbi replies, "Well, what do you think they invented VCRs for?" And the baseball fan replies, "Rabbi, that's a great idea! But... I didn't know Yom Kippur services were on cable!" [http://tinyurl.com/dc4zn]

As important as Rosh Hashanah is, it doesn't have quite the same pull as a holiday like Passover, where families get together for the seders. Nevertheless, that doesn't mean parents want to spend Rosh Hashanah alone. Check out how a pair of crafty parents got their kids to beat a path to their door for the holidays. [http://www.joyofjewish.com/jokes.html]

On the afternoon of the first day of Rosh Hashanah, Jews go to a nearby stream or body of water to perform the ritual of Tashlich. Prayers are recited and sins are symbolically tossed into the depths. Some people even shake out the hems of their clothing, while others toss breadcrumbs into the waters. [http://tinyurl.com/75nup] With that in mind, forgive me for bringing back one of my favourite pun-laden sites, a tongue-in-cheek look at the foods of Tashlich. Consider these options for this coming Rosh Hashanah. [http://tinyurl.com/cdfq4]

- For immodest dressing, Tarts
- For substance abuse, Stoned Wheat
- For being holier than thou, Bagels
- For unfairly upbraiding another, Challah
- And for wearing tasteless hats, Tam Tams.

Students send 'backpack hugs' to Katrina victims

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Within 24 hours of receiving a request for help, students at Leo Baeck Day School's Holy Blossom campus collected almost 300 backpacks for Hurricane Katrina evacuees in Houston.

Judith Finer Freedman, a Leo Baeck mother who used to live in Houston, got the ball rolling on Sept. 6 immediately after receiving an e-mail from a friend there requesting help above and beyond monetary donations.

"Many of the people living in shelters need something to put their donated clothes in, their few valuables in or toiletries in for moving around to go to computer centres, showers or out to look for jobs," her friend Stephanie Hamilton, a volunteer in the post-Katrina effort, wrote in the mass e-mail. "They need backpacks for keeping valuables with them, for transferring to other locations or (for the 58,000 children) for going to school."

Finer Freedman, a doctoral student who also serves as vice-chair of women's campaign and advocacy for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, forwarded the e-mail to Leo Baeck administrators and the school president for their input and offered to hand out flyers at carpool pick-up the next afternoon so that children could bring backpacks to a school barbecue the following day. It would be a way to show tikkun olam, she wrote.

The response showed "a pent-up desire for people to want to help," said Eric Petersiel, principal of the Holy Blossom campus, which has 300 students from kindergarten to Grade 8. Also, he noted, the project was "on a level the kids could understand. It gives them a real outlet for participating in tikkun olam."

Finer Freedman's children were "very excited" about the project, she said. Amanda, 9, and Zachary, 7, stayed up late with her to prepare boxes for the backpack drive the night before the barbecue.

As of last Thursday, organizers here were still trying to find a shipper or an airline to deliver the backpacks free of charge.

Petersiel told The CJN last week that in a follow-up e-mail, Hamilton wrote that, despite reports of some areas of New Orleans being safe to return to, there is still a need for backpacks. Most of the more than 200,000 evacuees in Houston have lost all their possessions, she wrote. Some of the children do not have parents, she noted.

Donated backpacks will contain the following message: "You may think this backpack looks empty but it's not. Look closely and you will see that it is full of hugs. Every time that you wear it remember that someone far away cares about you and is giving you a hug of hope for tomorrow."

Other Jewish day schools have also launched Katrina efforts. Leo Baeck's Thornhill campus is running a loose change drive. Children at United Synagogue Day Schools are also raising money, and a fundraising effort at Netivot Hatorah Day School was in the works last week.

Associated Hebrew Schools is holding a clothing and linens drive in collaboration with B'nai Brith Canada.

The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto offered to take displaced students tuition-free for the year, although no one has taken them up on the offer, said Paul Shaviv, the school's director of education. "Our understanding is that most of the students have been accommodated in the southern United States." CHAT students have raised more than $3,200 for the Hurricane Katrina fund established by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Jewish veterans honour their fallen comrades

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

In this year of the veteran, it is essential to remember all Jewish veterans who fell in active duty, spectators were told at a recent remembrance service sponsored by General Wingate Branch 256, Royal Canadian Legion.

Held at the Canadian Veteran War Memorial at Mount Sinai Cemetery each year before the High Holy Days, the service began with a parade chaired by Murray Jacobs.

"As our ranks diminish [60 years after the war], we fear that what was a defining moment in our lives will fade from people's memories," said Barney Danson, a former cabinet minister, who enlisted to fight in World War II as a rifleman and was wounded in Normandy.

"If we look at the attendance [at today's service], however, our fears are unfounded."

Danson, who was chair of the advisory committee to the Canadian War Museum in Ottawa, said that it was "very emotional" to see tens of thousands of people attend the opening of that museum.

"For us, the memories we carry are different than those of succeeding generations. We remember real people with real faces and real names who never lived to be veterans.

"These were young men [with whom] we enlisted, trained, served and chased skirts together."

It is a hugely emotional experience, he said, "to know in our hearts that when the chips were down we were there. No one can take [that feeling] away from us."

Sam Romberg, General Wingate Branch president, "thank[ed] God" that there are still veterans around to continue the memories.

Jacobs said that during the war "many comrades were surprised to discover that there were Jews by their side fighting for Canada."

The families of men and women killed overseas can pay tribute at the Canadian war veterans' cenotaph, he said.

Inside the cenotaph – the only one to list the names of Jewish Canadians – are the names of those killed in World War II and Israel's War of Independence, and in front of the cenotaph is a tomb with the names of those who died in Korea.

Lt.-Col. Leo Brooks, who represented the Canadian Forces College, told the crowd that the college has been around for 60 years to "[continue carrying] the torch that the veterans have carried. It is important for me to share in this event, and recognize those before me."

Jewish Education Ensures a Vibrant Future

Seymour Epstein, Ed. D.

Senior VP,
Jewish Education
and Identity,
UJA Federation

We are embarking on a wonderful new year for Jewish education in Toronto. Our schools are full of young children who, with the help of their dedicated teachers and devoted parents, will be coming into contact with the abundant riches of our heritage. We are making great efforts as a community to enhance the general picture of Jewish education in all of its varied aspects: formal schooling, youth work, camping, adult education, and teacher training.

The articles on these two pages refer to some of our points of pride in various accomplishments, but they do not give a full account of a community totally dedicated to excellence in the one domain that assures our vibrant future – Jewish education.

Critical to our success are young parents who make an early decision that Jewish education is a priority in their growing families. By either building on positive experiences that they had as children in the system, or the opposite - rejecting a past that was weak in Jewish learning, these parents must make a choice based on ideology, income, geography, and some other factors. We hope that they will choose the Jewish school best suited to their needs for the future growth of their children in the Jewish community.

We all hope that the 5766 school year will be one of engaged learning for every member of our community, not merely for Jewish continuity, but rather for creativity and growth.

Signed,

Baila Epi

Toronto Teacher Wins Prestigious Award

by Suzanne Wintrob

This academic year, Donna Robins can officially call herself an award-winning teacher.

The Toronto resident was recently awarded a Grinspoon-Steinhardt Award for Excellence in Jewish Education for her exceptional achievements in Jewish education and the significant impact she has made on her students and the community.

"I feel as if everything that I've ever believed in has been validated," says Robins. "I feel tremendously appreciated and recognized as a teacher. It's as if somebody shouted, 'Wow, you've worked so hard. Thank you!'"

Robins, who has devoted the past 18 years to Jewish education, currently teaches grade 7 at Temple Sinai supplementary school and grades 2 and 7 and Confirmation class (Grade 10) at Holy Blossom Temple. Her creativity and dedication have so impressed her students and colleagues that Temple Sinai's principal was quick to nominate her for the North American award. "Donna truly exhibits Hadracha B'Dugma, leadership by example," says Dr. Ira Schweitzer, Temple Sinai's Director of Education. "She's a living example of a Jew committed to her own Jewish life, and is, thereby able to guide the youth with whom she works."

Donna Robins

The award consists of a $2,500 (U.S.) cash prize, $1,500 of which must be put towards professional development. Robins will use the money to learn more about special education through the new Tikun Chaim program run by the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and Toronto's York University. For Robins, who had enrolled for the Tikun Chaim course long ago, the award couldn't have come at a better time. "I was so surprised," recalls Robins. "But now I'll be able to expand my knowledge and better help students of all abilities. Children deserve the very best that you have, and even if it takes a little more time and a little more effort, they certainly make it worthwhile."

Where Are They Now?

Since Toronto's Jewish school system was established decades ago, thousands of its graduates have gone on to achieve enormous success in business, public life, and community affairs. In this feature, we profile one such success story.

Rachael Turkienicz

Rachael Turkienicz can't remember a time when she wasn't completely absorbed with Jewish learning.

She grew up in Toronto, one of four children in a home rich with Eastern European and Sephardic Israeli heritage.

At a time when many of their friends were advocating Jewish education for boys, and only until their bar mitzvah, Rachael's parents sought Jewish learning for all of their children through high school.

Rachael's route took her from kindergarten at Associated Hebrew School to the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) where she graduated at just 16 years old. From there it was off to York University's Fine Arts program, but the bright teenager quickly realized it wasn't her calling so she switched to psychology instead. When that didn't feel right either she switched majors again. This time she picked up where she left off – as a Judaic Studies student – and enrolled in York's Jewish teacher training program. She left York with two degrees: a Bachelor of Education and an Honours B.A. in Religious Studies.

She continued on at Brandeis University, picking up a Masters degree and a PhD in Talmudic and Midrashic Literature. When she returned to Toronto, it seemed only fitting to go back to where it all began, and soon she was a respected faculty member of CHAT's Rabbinics department and York's Jewish teacher training program.

"My day school experience really gave a nice realistic view of the Jewish world," recalls Turkienicz. "When things came out of The Book and came alive, and when we began to talk and communicate on a personal level with the teachers, that's when I realized this wasn't just material; it was life and philosophy and world perspective. That's when everything just pulled together for me. It was something I couldn't let go."

"My day school experience really gave a nice realistic view of the Jewish world."

Indeed she hasn't. Since returning to Toronto, Turkienicz has immersed herself in the Jewish education field. She's a co-founder of the Toronto Heschel School and recently started The Learning Centre where adults can sign up for courses in Jewish studies and Jewish text. She's on the boards of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning and the North York Women's Resource Centre. She is the associate chair of the national executive of Canadian Jewish Congress and is a co-founder of the advocacy group Solidarity with Jews at Risk. She's a radio and television personality and she writes a monthly Midrash column in the Canadian Jewish News. Last spring she was granted the Person of Distinction Award by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University. Oh, and she's the proud mom of five children ranging in age from five to 18. They've all attended day school.

Turkienicz says she feels "lucky" to be living in a city with so many choices for Jewish education, and she encourages parents to investigate as many schools as possible to make sure they fit with the child's nature and the family's philosophy."

The Jewish Education Report

Weighing the Options in Jewish Education

More than 20 Schools to be Represented on September 28

by Suzanne Wintrob

There have never been so many options to give a child a Jewish education.

Some cities have but a few choices when it comes to Jewish education for children. But Toronto has such a vast array of choices available that some parents may find it perplexing to distinguish between them.

On Wednesday, September 28th, parents will be taking a close look at Toronto's numerous day schools and supplementary schools at the third annual Options in Jewish Education open house, co-sponsored by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education and the Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto. More than twenty schools will set up booths at the Leah Posluns Theatre. The evening will run from 7:30 p.m. until 10 p.m.

The options evening will give parents the chance to ask questions and get answers they need about the educational future of their children.

Dr. Seymour Epstein, senior vice-president for Jewish Education and Identity at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, says the event is geared to parents of preschool and elementary aged children as they make decisions about their children's future and their role within the Jewish world.

"The program gives parents a chance, in one evening, to make sense of the total rainbow of tremendously diverse possibilities in schooling for their children, whether in day school or supplementary school," says Epstein. "They will receive information about the situation in general and have a chance to meet representatives from the individual schools and see which school meets their geographical needs, their ideological needs, and so on."

Baila Lubek, Chair of the Board of Jewish Education, notes that this event helps parents learn about such matters as curriculum, financial assistance, special education, ministry requirements, staff development and much more. "One area of concern at past events," says Lubek, "was how the elementary schools prepare their students for high school. This evening gives parents the opportunity to hear the schools' responses."

The program gives parents a chance, in one evening, to make sense of the total rainbow of tremendously diverse possibilities in schooling for their children.

But the evening does much more than that. It's also a great opportunity for schools to meet the parents themselves and find out their special needs and concerns. Toronto is fortunate to have so many different schools catering to a wide range of perspectives and personal needs; this contributes to the vibrancy of the community. The Options in Jewish Education event will also benefit the schools by providing them with a broader picture of the community's changing needs. It's an educational win-win situation for everyone.

Teaching our Principals the Principles

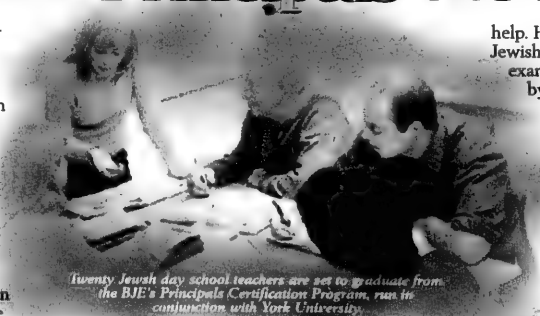
Simon Wolle fell into full time teaching by accident, but just six years into it he's already preparing for the possibility of becoming a principal one day.

"If there's going to be an opportunity for me down the road to take on an administrator's role, I'll need to understand more about the issues that might come up," says the lawyer who is now the Co-Director of Attendance and Discipline at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Tanenbaum Campus (CHAT).

Later this year, Mr. Wolle and 19 other Jewish day school teachers will graduate from the Jewish Day School Principals Certification Program offered by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education and run in conjunction with York University. Facilitators are Sam Kapustin, CHAT's Director of Jewish Studies; Robyn Shiner, Vice Principal of General Studies at Netivot Hatorah Day School; and, Sharon Basman, former principal of Pineway Public School.

The 16-month course, which follows the same curriculum as York University's Principals Certification Program for public school teachers, covers everything from school vision, curriculum development and technology issues to learning programs such as special education and enrichment classes. But Kapustin explains, it also integrates issues unique to Jewish schools.

"I don't know any other Jewish community in North America that has developed such an extensive program to train its Jewish educators as Toronto has," says Kapustin, a graduate of the program's inaugural class. "The content deals specifically with the multitude of issues they are likely to face in a Jewish day school environment, setting them up for success as they move into administration roles."



Twenty Jewish day school teachers are set to graduate from the BJE's Principals Certification Program, run in conjunction with York University.

Wolle says he now has a more complete sense of what a school's administrative roles entail and the overwhelming responsibilities involved. For example, he learned why it's important to give teachers time to reflect on what they're doing rather than "bombarding them with curriculum they never get to digest." He learned which Jewish community leaders and agencies he can turn to for help. He particularly liked the course's focus on Jewish continuity, with ideas like bullying being examined from a Judaic perspective first followed by the wider moral and legal issues.

"As a teacher we only really see a piece of the puzzle that affects us at a personal level," says the CHAT graduate, who opted for a career in teaching after helping an Ottawa public high school develop its law curriculum. "But the course showed us what administrators go through on a daily basis and how they look at the big picture. We learned how a decision that you make can affect everyone, from a fellow teacher to support staff. We also saw how that decision can create a wave outside of the school by affecting other Jewish schools or even the wider Jewish community. It was really eye opening and worthwhile."

Dinner to support Israel's humanitarian services

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Ezer Mizion, Israel's national health support organization, will hold its first "Evening of Chessed Dinner Reception" Sept. 26.

The event, to be held at the Windsor Arms Hotel, will be sponsored by Torontonian Peter Friedmann, who founded Canadian Friends of Ezer Mizion about three years ago after several years of helping the organization, which does humanitarian work across Israel.

"Ezer Mizion has been the best kept secret in our community," say Randy Cohen, who co-chairs the dinner with Arthur Stern and Hershy Weinberg.

An umbrella organization for several humanitarian endeavours in Israel, Ezer Mizion was founded in 1979 with eight volunteers who provided medical and social support services to Israel's sick, disabled and elderly population and people in crisis.

Today, it has more than 10,000 volunteers who help about half a million people every year.

Ezer Mizion's projects include the largest Jewish registry of potential bone marrow donors in the world; a convalescent home for young cancer patients and their families; a program to help families cope with the physical, emotional and financial demands of caring for a child with cancer; clubs for the elderly; an Alzheimer intervention program; and a playground for children with special needs.

It operates a food distribution program for family members of hospitalized patients, the elderly and the disabled; loan centres for medical rehabilitation and pediatric physiotherapy; and a blood bank. In addition, Friedmann has initiated and helps fund a program for orphans of terror victims.

On a trip to Israel three years ago, Friedmann visited a number of service organizations and was impressed with the magnitude of the work done by the volunteers at Ezer Mizion. He found, however, that they did not have a program for orphans of terror victims.

Friedmann offered to finance a program and on his return to Toronto, he created a support arm for the orphans.

Then, two years ago, the Cohens, who had been to Israel before, began planning to take their family there to commemorate their daughter's bat mitzvah. Cohen looked for a project that would connect his daughter to Israel.

"We wanted our daughter Leedan to connect with a chesed service on this special year. We felt she should have the education and the commitment to do something for those in need in Israel."

Cohen searched the Web and found a Jerusalem Post article on Ezer Mizion (www.ezer-mizion.org.il).

When the Cohens went to Israel for the bat mitzvah, the family volunteered at Ezer Mizion.

"In Jerusalem, they suggested that I call Peter Friedmann and that we could put our resources together to raise funds and bring awareness of Ezer Mizion and the wonderful work carried on by them in Israel."

This led to the formation of a Toronto committee that planned the organization's first fundraiser, the Chessed Dinner.

Cohen notes that families across North America are helping Ezer Mizion in many ways and children are donating their bar and bat mitzvah gifts to the organization and sponsoring projects.

For more information on Ezer Mizion or to reserve for the Chessed Dinner, call 1-877-544-3866.

Seminar intended to inspire women before holidays

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Women should get a lot more out of the High Holy Days than cooking, cleaning and grocery shopping, say organizers of "The Quiet Voice," a three-day seminar for women that begins Sept. 25 at noon.

To be held at the Village Shul Aish HaTorah Learning Centre, the seminar, sponsored by Aish Toronto, is designed to "banish the pre-yom tov blues by focusing on the profound potential for personal inspiration available to all women," organizers say in promotional material.

"[We want] women to tune into the quiet voice so drowned out by our work-a-day lives. Take an inner excursion to your core and re-orient yourself for the new year."

Nancy Weisbrod, one of the seminar's co-ordinators and a presenter, says this is one of the only seminars of its kind in Toronto, and hundreds of women of all ages, denominations and walks of life are expected to attend.

The long weekend of events includes talks such as "Rediscovering Yourself with the Mystical Power of the Shofar," by Rabbi Yisroel Roll; "Healing as a Path to Holiness," with Rebbetzin Sherri Mandell; "Tshuvah: the Gift of Return," with Chaya Schon; "Yom Kippur: How Come Nobody is Eating and I Still Have to Make Dinner," with Rabbi Mannis Friedman; and "The Joy of Being a Jewish Woman," with Rebbetzin Feige Twerski.

Also on the agenda is a cooking demonstration, titled "Eat Your Blessing," with Rebbetzin Chana Veffer and Nancy Weisbrod, and a demonstration titled "Divine Whispers: A Women's Prayer," with Rebbetzin Chana Weisberg. At the end of each day, women will have a chance to meet the presenters, says Weisbrod. "It is a unique event that promises something for every woman."

Looking back on raid on Iraq's nuclear reactor

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Twenty four years on, the commander of the audacious Israeli air raid on Iraq's nuclear reactor remains convinced that it was absolutely essential for Israel's survival.

"It was the right thing to do," said Col. Zeev Raz, who was here recently to describe the daring attack on June 7, 1981 in which Iraq's French-built facility near Baghdad was destroyed.

The incursion, dubbed Operation Opera, was initially condemned by the international community, including the United States, Israel's chief ally. But after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait in August 1990, opinion about Israel's raid shifted and generally came to be seen in a positive light.

"Everyone realized it was a wise thing to do," he said, referring to Israel's success in stopping Iraq from developing an atomic capability.

Raz, here at the invitation of the Jewish National Fund, issued a warning that Iran's current attempt to build a nuclear arsenal is an equally dangerous development that should be nipped in the bud, preferably by diplomatic means. Citing U.S. intelligence reports, he declared that Iran could well acquire a nuclear capability within two years.

Urging countries such as Canada and Japan to pressure Iran to end its nuclear program, Raz said that Iran's nuclear facilities are scattered, buried deeply underground and thus immune to aerial attacks. "In Iran, there is no single target," he explained in a lecture at Adath Israel Congregation. "There are many, many targets."

And Iran is farther away than Iraq, added Raz, who was in Toronto on a Canada-wide speaking tour.

Given all these variables, the Israeli Air Force would be hard-pressed to knock out Iran's nuclear sites, he said. Only a conventional land force could realistically demolish them.

Prior to its invasion of Iraq in 2003, the United States might have considered taking action against Iran, he noted. But that option has evaporated now that U.S. troops are engaged in an increasingly difficult war with insurgents in Iraq.

Raz cast doubt on Iran's argument that its nuclear program is for peaceful purposes only, and did not rule out the possibility that Iran might be tempted to drop an atomic device on Tel Aviv.

Raz, who joined the air force in 1967, flew F-4 Phantoms during the 1973 Yom Kippur War. He was appointed commander of an F-16 squadron in 1980 after undergoing special training in the United States. He was 32, and a father of four, when he learned he would spearhead the raid in Iraq. He retired in 1990, and today, he is a defence consultant.

Israel chose 1981 as the year to strike after learning that Iraq would activate its Osirak reactor in 1982, he said.

Israel's prime minister, Menachem Begin, was eager to smash it, but postponed a final decision until all his ministers were on side. Originally planned for May, the raid was moved up to June to give dissenting ministers time to reassess their views. According to Raz, they were swayed by the chief of staff, Gen. Rafael Eitan, and the head of the air force, Gen. David Ivri.

The attack force consisted of 8 F-16s and two F-15s in the role as escorts. All but one of the pilots were senior officers. The lowest-ranking and youngest pilot, Ilan Ramon, was a captain. He would achieve fame as Israel's first astronaut. Ramon was killed on his first official mission in space on Feb. 1, 2003.

The pilots were supplied with Iraqi dinars in case they were shot down over enemy territory. Raz ridiculed the notion that dinars could ever be of use in an emergency situation.

Israel had no refuelling capacity for the long flight to and from Iraq, but solved the problem with "a few tricks." As he put it, "We improvised. We didn't go by the books."

The Israelis roared off from the Etzion base, near Eilat, on a Sunday afternoon, on the eve of Shavuot. They left before sunset so that landmarks could be better identified en route to the target, a distance of some 1,100 kilometres.

King Hussein of Jordan was in neighbouring Aqaba that afternoon and saw the Israeli formation streak toward Iraq, Raz said. He reportedly passed on the information to Saddam Hussein, the president of Iraq, but the message did not reach him.

Flying at 40,000 feet, the raiders reached the target area within about 90 minutes. Much to Raz's surprise, the Iraqis did not send up interceptor aircraft, even though the Israelis had probably been electronically detected 15 to 20 minutes earlier.

"It was too good to be true," said Raz, a man of more than medium height with a thick mane of salt-and-pepper hair who was clad in a dark suit and a tie and looked every bit like an ordinary businessman. "I couldn't believe my eyes."

Approaching the reactor, the formation dropped to 7,000 feet, an altitude from which its gleaming dome was clearly visible. The Israelis released a payload of 2,000-ton bombs. They did not carry "smart" bombs.

There was a blinding explosion and the reactor collapsed in a burning infero, killing one French technician who was not expected to be there.

The moment of impact was recorded by a camera mounted on the nose of an Israeli plane. A brief video clip, entitled Raid on the Sun, was shown to the audience prior to Raz's talk.

On Sept. 30, 1980, Iran, then bogged down in what would be a protracted war with Iraq, had tried to take out the reactor in a botched bombing.

Israel pulverized the reactor in a two-minute operation, setting back Iraq's nuclear ambitions by years.

Israeli rescue helicopters were standing by, just in case any of the pilots had to bail out.

With smoke pouring from the reactor, the Israelis climbed back up to 40,000 feet and headed west, chasing the sun as they zoomed back to their base.

Strangely enough, Iraqi planes stationed in bases in western Iraq, from which Scud missiles were fired at Israel in the 1991 Gulf War, were not ordered to intercept the intruders. This still puzzles Raz, who speculated that Iraq's air defence system may have failed.

Apples and honey bring sweet blessings to the New Year

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

aggie Glezer knows there is definitely more than one way to braid a challah! Glezer was captivated by the symbolism and myriad meanings in each twist of the challah's braid, leading her to years of research and recipe testing.

The result is her award-winning cookbook, A Blessing of Bread (Artisan). There are more than 60 impeccably tested recipes, old and new, for challah and other Sabbath and holiday loaves, plus an exploration of the rich symbolism of their history and the rituals governing their baking and eating.

Glezer's outstanding guide to Jewish baking harbours a wealth of recipes for challahs from around the world, babkas and honey cakes, coffee cakes, bagels, matzah, crackers, as well as everyday breads including deli-style rye. Her pita recipes include Israeli Za'atar and Iraqi Pita.

In the challah category alone, you'll find recipes with more twists, turns and shapes than you can imagine. There are recipes for Czernowitzer, Guatemalen, Russian, Lithuanian, Ukrainian and Hungarian challahs, even sweet and sourdough challahs. The book is packed with step-by-step photos to guide both novice and experienced bakers through the intricacies of shaping and baking beautiful, worldly breads.

Working with bakers from Guatemala to Russia, Glezer perfected her recipes, many of which had never been written down. Recollections from Jewish grandmothers and great-grandmothers all over the world remind us of life as it once was, and riveting oral histories, ancient legends, shtetl folktales and proverbs throughout will delight and inspire the baker in us all.

'An enticing Rosh Hashanah centrepiece'

For Rosh Hashanah, there is an unusual recipe for Sephardi Pumpkin Bread, adapted from Gilda Angel's recipe in Sephardic Home Cooking. Angel writes, "Food made with pumpkin is served to express the hope that as this vegetable has been protected by a thick covering, God will protect us and gird us with strength."

After much deliberation, I decided to feature Glezer's Apple Challah, which makes an enticing Rosh Hashanah centrepiece and a much-appreciated gift. It is wonderful for breakfast or with coffee. She cuts the apples into very large chunks to minimize surface area and hence apple juice. She avoids cinnamon to let the apple flavour shine through, but likes to finish off the bread with a sugared crust. Braeburn apples have a good spicy flavour and do not fall apart during baking, but you can substitute any favourite baking apple.

APPLE CHALLAH

2 envelopes instant yeast
5 cups bread flour
1 cup warm water
3 large eggs
1/3 cup vegetable oil, plus extra for oiling the pan and for topping
2 1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 cup granulated sugar, plus extra for sprinkling
3 large baking apples, preferably Braeburns (about 4 1/2 heaping cups cut-up apples)

Challah as seen in The Jewish Kitchen by Clarissa Hyman, Interlink Books

In a large bowl, whisk together yeast and 1 cup of the flour, then whisk in warm water until smooth. Let stand uncovered for 10 to 20 minutes or until it begins to ferment and puff up slightly.

Whisk eggs, oil, salt and sugar into puffed yeast mixture until eggs are well incorporated and salt and sugar have dissolved. With your hands or a wooden spoon, stir in remaining 4 cups flour all at once. When mixture is a shaggy ball, scrape it out onto work surface and knead until it is smooth and firm, no more than 10 minutes. If dough is too firm to knead easily, add a tablespoon or two of water to it; if it seems too wet, add a few tablespoons of flour. Dough should feel smooth, soft and only slightly sticky.

Soak a mixing bowl in hot water to clean it and warm it. Place dough in the warmed clean bowl and cover it with plastic wrap. Let ferment for 1 hour, or until just slightly puffed.

Peel, quarter and core the apples. Cut each quarter in half lengthwise, then cut each slice crosswise into three pieces. You should end up with large squarish chunks. Measure 4 1/2 heaping cups of chunks and transfer to a covered container. (Braeburns do not brown excessively, but if you are using another variety and are concerned about overbrowning, toss apples with a few drops of lemon juice.)

Sprinkle dough and work surface with flour and pull dough out of the bowl. Cut dough into two equal pieces and keep one piece covered while you work with the other. Roll out dough into a 16-inch square about 1/8 in. thick. Scatter 1 heaping cup of apples over the centre third of the dough. Fold up the bottom third to cover them. Press dough into apples to seal it around them.

Scatter another heaping cup over the folded-over apple-filled portion of dough. Fold the top of dough over it to create a very stuffed letter fold. Press down on dough to push out any air pockets and to seal dough around apples.

Roll dough up from a short side into a chunky cylinder, push dough into bowl with smooth side up, and cover with plastic wrap. Repeat with the other piece of dough and put it in a second covered bowl. Let dough ferment for about another hour, or until slightly risen and very soft.

Oil two 8-inch round cake pans, or 8 1/2 x 4 1/2 loaf pans. Using as much dusting flour as you need, pat each dough half into a rough round or log shape. Try to keep dough's smooth skin intact over the top. You won't be able to deflate the dough much at this point because of the apples. Slip dough into pans, smooth side up, and cover well with plastic wrap. (The shaped loaves can be refrigerated for up to 24 hours.) Let the loaves proof until they have risen over the edges of their pans, about 30 minutes (or up to 1 1/2 hours if loaves have been refrigerated.)

Immediately after shaping the breads (or 30 minutes before baking if refrigerated), arrange an oven rack in the lower third position, remove any racks above it, and preheat oven to 350.

Old fashioned cake is brought up to date

When loaves have risen and do not push back when gently pressed with your finger but remain indented, brush each one with a generous tablespoon of oil, then sprinkle them with a few tablespoons of sugar to form a sugary-oily crust. Bake for 45 to 55 minutes, until very well browned. After the first 40 minutes, switch the pans from front to back so that the breads brown evenly. When loaves are done, remove them from the oven, unmould and let cool on a rack. Makes two 9-inch round loaves or two 8½ x 4½-inch loaves.

My second selection from the book was an aromatic honey cake that keeps for weeks in the refrigerator. What makes it unusual is that the batter is refrigerated for 8 to 24 hours before baking. The recipe comes from Esther Kramer, who remembers her mother lining their farmhouse's windowsills with batter-filled pans to chill overnight. Sliced thin, this cake is the traditional dessert after a rich Rosh Hashanah meal, when honey is a symbol of a sweet New Year. Maggie Glezer's family likes to break the Yom Kippur fast with it as well.

She modified the original recipe by using coffee instead of water and dark brown sugar instead of white. Chopped crystallized ginger adds a rich vibrant spiciness, but can be omitted. If you prefer a more pungent spiciness, you could double the spice quantities given, or add allspice, mace, nutmeg, anise or whatever you prefer. Some people omit the nuts when making this cake for Rosh Hashanah because they refrain from eating nuts on this holiday. Enjoy!

LEKACH (OLD-FASHIONED HONEY CAKE)

6 cups unbleached all-purpose flour
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
½ tsp. ground cloves
1½ tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
1½ cups packed dark brown sugar
¾ cup vegetable oil
¾ cup mild honey
1 tbsp. salt
⅔ cup hot strong coffee
3 large eggs
1½ cups walnut pieces (optional)
1½ cups chopped crystallized ginger, plus small cubes for decorating (optional)

Early in the day or the day before baking, mix the batter. Oil two 9 x 5-inch loaf pans. In a very large bowl, mix together flour, cinnamon, cloves, baking powder and baking soda.

In a large pitcher or another bowl, whisk together brown sugar, oil, honey (measure it in the same cup as the oil and it will slip right out), salt and hot coffee until sugar and salt have dissolved. Add eggs and whisk until well blended. Pour the liquid ingredients into the dry ingredients and stir until the batter is very smooth and thick. Fold in nuts and ginger, if using them.

Scrape the batter into prepared pans and smooth the tops. For a pretty presentation, press small cubes of ginger across the tops of the cakes. Cover the pans with plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 8 hours, or up to 24 hours.

On baking day: 30 minutes before baking, arrange an oven rack in the lower third position, remove any racks above it and preheat oven to 325.

Bake cakes about 1 hour or until well browned and a toothpick or wooden skewer poked into the centre comes out dry. After the first 30 minutes of baking, turn them around so that they bake evenly. Let cakes cool thoroughly in the pans on a rack before serving. Sealed in plastic bags, these cakes keep for weeks in the refrigerator. Makes two 9 x 5-in. cakes.

Holiday menu suggestions from the Kashruth Council of Canada

To help celebrate the upcoming High Holy Days, the Kashruth Council of Canada has prepared some special recipes that you and your family can enjoy for Rosh Hashanah as well as throughout the year.

AUTUMN VEGETABLE SOUP

1 tsp. olive oil
1 large onion, finely chopped
2 garlic cloves, minced
2 carrots, sliced
3 celery stalks, thinly sliced
½ cup diced zucchini
½ cup diced yellow squash
1 19-oz. can stewed tomatoes
½ tsp. dried basil
1 tsp. dried oregano
½ tsp. dried thyme
4 tsp. low sodium instant soup mix mixed with 4 cups hot water
2 cups Boston lettuce, coarsely chopped
salt and pepper to taste

Heat the oil in a large saucepan over medium heat. Add the onion and garlic and sauté for 3 minutes. Add the carrots, celery, zucchini and squash and sauté for 6 minutes. Add the tomatoes, basil, oregano and thyme and cook for 1 minute. Add the instant soup mixture and bring to a boil. Reduce the heat and simmer, uncovered, for 20 minutes. Add the lettuce and cook for another 3 minutes. Season with salt and pepper. Serves 6-8.

ORZO SALAD WITH ORANGE DRESSING

This will keep well for several days in refrigerator. If you make it in advance, add the carrots just before serving so that they will be crunchy.

1 cup uncooked orzo
3 cups water
3 cups shredded carrots
2 green onions, sliced
1 red or green pepper, diced
1 rib celery, sliced
1 cup raisins
2 tbsp. finely chopped flat leaf parsley
1 can mandarin oranges, drained (optional)

Dressing:
¾ cup fresh orange juice
juice of 1 lemon
1 clove garlic, minced
2 tbsp. dry white kosher wine
1 tsp. soy sauce
1 tsp. grated ginger (optional)
1 tsp. sugar
salt and pepper to taste

Combine the dressing ingredients in a jar, mixing well, or in a food processor. Set aside.

Cook the orzo in the rapidly boiling water until tender (about 7 minutes). Rinse under cold water and drain well for 2-3 minutes. Combine with the other ingredients. Add dressing. Serve at room temperature. Serves 8.

COR recipes: a nutritional analysis

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

More and more people of all ages are becoming aware of the nutritional value of the foods they eat.

With an increase in obesity, heart disease and other conditions, there is a greater emphasis placed on eating healthy and recognizing the foods and snacks that add the unnecessary pounds that create health hazards.

There are many diets available and hundreds of books on different methods of losing weight and keeping it off.

To assist us in analyzing what we eat, we asked Jenny Libman, who is studying Applied Human Nutrition at the University of Guelph, to take three of the Rosh Hashanah recipes offered by the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR) and break down their nutritional components for our readers.

Libman, who stresses the need for people to learn about nutrition, says her career goal is "to help educate people on how to make healthy choices."

The average diet should be based on 2,000 calories a day, of which 30 per cent should be from fat, 50 to 60 per cent from carbohydrates and 20 per cent protein. We should have no more than 1,200 to 1,500 mg sodium a day, she says.

Libman's interest in nutrition began when she was a child. She is a vegetarian, which she says came about gradually over the years, but she adds that eating lean cuts of meat and white poultry is healthy.

"The problem comes when eating meat becomes the centre of your diet. If you eat too much, you are not getting enough benefit from the other food groups."

With more and more people eating out, she notes that you can eat in a restaurant, but you should be aware of the healthy options on the menu, such as salad, grilled meats or fish. "Even pasta if you watch the amount of sauce."

Here is her review of three of the Kashruth Council's recipes.

Autumn vegetable soup:
58 calories per serving

1 g protein
10 g carbohydrate
2 g fibre

Honey squash casserole
207 calories per serving
8 g fat
1 g saturated fat

413 mg sodium

Mouth-watering chocolate mousse
451 calories per serving
31 g fat
9 g saturated fat
10 g protein
34 g carbohydrate
0 g fibre
85 mg sodium

Looking at the recipes, she notes that the Autumn Vegetable Soup calls for canned tomatoes, which account for 170 calories per serving. "If fresh tomatoes were used," she says, "it would greatly reduce the calorie count.

"Soup is very healthy, and with fewer calories, it can help fill you up and therefore reduce your hunger."

Analyzing the recipe for Honey Squash Casserole, she notes that it is not too high in fat and is very nutritious.

Turning to the Chocolate Mousse, she says, "This and many other desserts are high in fat. But as long as people realize that it is high in calories and fat but know not to eat it often, then it is acceptable because you need to have a treat once in awhile."

She says children should be taught healthy eating at school. "Every kid should take a nutrition class and there are many articles and information everywhere on healthy eating.

"If you follow Canada's Food Guide, it's your safest bet. It tells you the number of servings in each food group and what a serving is. The Food Guide is readily available.

Holiday Food Ideas

Add some Italian flavour to your holiday meal

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Celebrated cookbook author and chef Joyce Goldstein can trace her bloodline to a Russian shtetl, but her heart and soul are Italian.

In 1957, she made her first trip to Italy and instantly became what she calls a "fanatic Italophile." Daughter of Russian immigrants, this award-winning author, cooking instructor and former chef/owner of the San Francisco restaurant Square One threw herself into Italian art, architecture, language, culture – and food.

Out of her travels and study came Cucina Ebraica: Flavors of the Italian Jewish Kitchen (Chronicle Books), newly released in paperback, an exhaustively researched, beautifully photographed homage to a cuisine dating back to Roman times.

Not exactly the first place you'd think to look for a Rosh Hashanah menu, but why not? The Jews of Italy can trace their roots to the second century BCE, making it the oldest Jewish community in the world, Goldstein observes.

The recipes are Italian all right, but what makes Crostini di Spuma di Tonno, Zuppa di Pesce Passato or Dolce di Tagliatelle particularly Jewish?

As in every corner of the Diaspora, Jewish cooks throughout the ages have used their creativity to wed regional cuisine to the laws of kashrut. Sometimes a clue lies in what is missing – no besciamella (cream) sauce or cheese on meat, for instance. The names of recipes may contain a telltale ending, "alla Guidia" or "alla Mosaica," denoting "Jewish style," "per Sabato" for Sabbath dishes or "per Pesach."

"These are very regional Italian recipes," says Goldstein, "and often you can tell just by looking at them where the Jews lived. Sometimes what makes these recipes Jewish is the name, like Scaloppini di Tacchino Rebecca or Minestra di Esau, but a lot of times you can't tell, unless you see margarine or oil where they might have used butter."

While the book is thoroughly researched, Goldstein never sacrifices flavour for authenticity. Where she finds a recipe bland, she adjusts the seasoning. "Our palates today are not used to things simple and good; they're a little more stimulated. We're used to eating all kinds of food here, so the ante is up, and we want a little bit more flavour."

She also admits to adjusting cooking times, as many of the oldest recipes were overcooked by today's standards. "These are people that lived without ovens. They brought things to the baker to be cooked and picked up later, and some things were cooked a very long time. Vegetables – in those days you never got a crunch in your life!"

Trained and educated as an artist, Goldstein is a consummate historian with an exacting palate, and in her capable hands, food and art blend. "When you cook you are organizing flavours and appearance, colours, smells, tastes. To me that's like organizing a canvas when you're painting, like composition, choice of textures and colors."

She is equally passionate about using locally grown ingredients. "The raw materials of the region are fabulous: Italian eggs with red yolks, flavourful, fresh chickens, vegetables that are picked one minute and served the next. Italians are totally driven by the quality of their ingredients, whereas if I go to the supermarket, when was it picked? When was it put out? When did I cook it? Three days maybe have lapsed, and it's not as flavourful."

Many of the ingredients traditionally used in Italian cuisine – tomatoes, peppers, potatoes, corn, pumpkin – were New World foods brought by the explorers to Spain and Portugal, where Jews, relegated to making their livelihood in trade and import, introduced them to the community at large. They were then transplanted to Italy by Sephardim who found refuge there during the Inquisition.

For your main course, try Stufadin di Zuca Zala (Braised Meat with Butternut Squash), reminiscent of Ashkenazi tzimmes. Here squash and Marsala add a touch of sweetness, bringing a wish for a sweet new year to your Rosh Hashanah table.

Traditionally for the holiday new fruits are served, and it is customary in Italy to poach quinces both for Rosh Hashanah and to break the fast for Yom Kippur. With an infusion of cloves and cinnamon, serve Mele Cotogne in Giulebbe (Quince in Syrup) alone or with Boca di Dama (Almond Sponge Cake).

BOCA DI DAMA

This version of bocca di dama may also be served to break the fast at Yom Kippur.

1⅔ cups finely chopped blanched almonds
1 cup plus 2 tbsp. granulated sugar

Preheat oven to 350. Butter a 10-in. springform pan.

In a food processor, combine the almonds and 1/3 cup of the granulated sugar and process until ground. Set aside.

In a bowl, beat together the whole eggs, egg yolks and remaining sugar until very thick and pale. Gradually add the flour, the ground almond mixture, and the lemon zest. Spoon into the prepared pan.

Bake until a toothpick inserted into the centre of the cake emerges clean, 45 to 50 minutes. Remove from oven and let cool completely on a rack. Release the pan sides and slide the cake onto a serving platter. If you like, sift a dusting of confectioners' sugar over the top. Serves 8 to 10.

MELE COTOGNE IN GIULEBBE
Quince in Syrup

2 lbs. quinces
2 cups sugar
1 cup water, or as needed
2 whole cloves
2 cinnamon sticks

In a large saucepan, combine the quinces with water to cover. Bring to a boil over high heat and cook, uncovered, until barely tender, 10 to 15 minutes. Drain the quinces and, when cool enough to handle, peel, halve, core and cut into slices.

To make the syrup, in a saucepan large enough to accommodate the sliced quinces, combine the sugar, 1 cup water, cloves and cinnamon sticks. Place over medium heat and bring to a simmer, stirring to dissolve the sugar. Add the quinces and additional water if needed to cover. Simmer for 5 minutes. Then, over the course of 12 hours, bring the quince slices to a boil in the syrup 3 times, boiling them for 5 minutes each time. This helps to bring up the rich red colour of the fruit and allows them to absorb the syrup over time.

Transfer to a serving dish and refrigerate. Serve chilled. Serves 6.

Almond sponge cake

STUFADIN DI ZUCA ZALA
Braided Meat with Butternut Squash

4 tbsp. olive oil
2 large onions, chopped
1 clove garlic, minced
1 tbsp. chopped fresh rosemary
2 lbs. cubed veal for stew
salt to taste
1 cup Marsala or other kosher sweet wine
1 butternut squash, about 1 lb., halved, seeds and fibres removed, peeled, cut into 1/2-inch cubes, and parboiled in salted water for 5 minutes
1 1/2 cups meat or chicken broth, or as needed freshly ground black pepper to taste

Warm 2 tbsp. of the olive oil in a sauté pan over low heat. Add the onions, garlic and rosemary and sauté until tender and translucent, about 8 minutes. Remove from heat and set aside.

Warm the remaining 2 tbsp. olive oil in a heavy pot over high heat. Add the meat and brown well on all sides, sprinkling with a little salt after it has browned. Add the wine and let it bubble up. Add the sauted onions, the butternut squash and the broth to cover and bring to a boil. Cover, reduce the heat to low, and simmer gently until the meat is tender and the squash has formed a puree, 1 to 1 1/4 hours. Season with salt and pepper before serving.

Variation: You can use 3/4 pound carrots, peeled and grated, in place of the squash. Serves 4 to 6.

Main courses guaranteed to please

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

For the holidays this year, put convention aside and instead of the usual roast chicken and brisket, try one of these fabulously tasty main courses. Guaranteed to please, they will not only enliven your holiday table, but are sure to become year-round pleasers.

Cornish hens with pistachio paste as seen in Kosher By Design Entertains by Susie Fishbein, Mesorah Publications.

ROASTED CORNISH HENS WITH GARLIC AND SAGE STUFFED WITH COUSCOUS

Cornish hens or Rock Cornish hens, as they are sometimes known, are generally sold frozen, so plan ahead. They will need 24 hours to defrost in the refrigerator. Half a hen is usually considered a serving. I love to toast the raw couscous in a dry skillet for 3 to 5 minutes before I steam it. This helps give it a nutty taste and aroma.

2½ cups chicken stock
3 tbsp. olive oil
3 tbsp. finely grated lemon rind
½ tsp. salt and pepper
2 cups regular or whole wheat couscous
4 Cornish game hens
30-40 sage leaves
10 cloves garlic, sliced
3 tbsp. Dijon mustard
1 tbsp. lemon juice

In a saucepan, combine stock, oil, lemon rind and half of salt and pepper; bring to boil. Stir in couscous; cover immediately and remove from heat. Let stand for 5 minutes. Fluff with fork. (Couscous can be covered with plastic wrap and refrigerated for up to 24 hours).

Meanwhile, cut wing tips off hens. Cut through backbones and then through breastbones to halve hens. Without removing skin, gently loosen skin from each breast and leg. Stuff each part with three to four sage leaves and garlic slices.

Line rimmed baking sheet with foil; grease lightly. Make 8 mounds of couscous, about 1 cup each, on prepared baking sheet. Place hen half over each, cut side down. Sprinkle hens with remaining salt and pepper. In small bowl, whisk together mustard and lemon juice; brush over hens.

Bake in centre of preheated 375 oven for about 45 minutes or until juices run clear when hens are pierced. Broil for 1 to 2 minutes to colour skin if desired. Makes 8 servings.

CHICKEN IN SPICY WALNUT SAUCE

For maximum flavour, buy walnuts in the bulk section of your supermarket. These tend to be California walnuts, which are bigger, more tan in colour, meatier and fresher. To preserve that freshness, store them in your freezer. You can toast them in a dry skillet on the stove top for about 5 minutes, or in a 350 oven for 5 to 8 minutes. The sauce can be made up to 1 day ahead and rewarmed gently in the microwave, at 1- minute intervals, stirring between each minute.

8 bone-in, skin-on chicken breasts
½ tsp. each salt and pepper
2 tbsp. olive oil
⅓ cup lemon marmalade
1 large onion, chopped
4 cloves garlic, minced
1 tsp dried dill weed
¼ tsp. cayenne pepper
pinch cinnamon
1 tbsp. all-purpose flour
1½ cups chicken stock
2 tbsp. lemon juice
2 cups finely chopped toasted walnuts
¼ cup chopped fresh dill

Place chicken in single layer on foil-lined rimmed baking sheet. Sprinkle with half of salt and pepper. In small bowl, whisk together 1 tbsp of olive oil and marmalade; brush over chicken. Bake in centre of preheated 375 oven for about 40 minutes or until no longer pink inside. Remove to platter.

Meanwhile, in skillet, heat remaining oil over medium heat. Add onion, garlic, dill weed, cayenne, cinnamon and remaining salt and pepper. Cook, stirring, for about 8 minutes or until vegetables are very soft. Stir in flour for 1 minute. Pour in stock and lemon juice; boil for three minutes. Stir in walnuts, stirring until well blended and heated through. Stir in fresh dill weed.

Serve over chicken or pass around separately. Makes 8 servings

Variation: This is also delicious done with boneless skinless chicken breasts; cook breasts as directed, reducing time to 20 to 25 minutes. Then nestle in sauce until well coated. Serve immediately.

Wines to enhance any meal

For a satisfying wine experience, it's important to know the right wines to buy, how to care for them and how to serve them.

For starters, you should always store your wines in a cool dry place, with the bottle lying on its side or upside down. Why? The cork must always be kept wet to allow it to expand. Because air spoils wine, an expanded cork prevents air from entering the bottle.

The shelf life of a good bottle of white wine can range from two to four years, whereas a superior bottle of red wine can last from 10 to 20 years.

White wine must be chilled and can be served immediately after removal from the refrigerator. Red wine should be chilled, uncorked before serving and left at room temperature for about 1½ hours. This procedure allows the wine to breathe, so that its aroma can be enhanced.

Some wines contribute to the taste of specific foods. For example, dessert wines are sweet and best served with cakes and pastries. Red meat requires a heavier red wine, whereas fish and chicken are best complemented with white or red wine.

Here are some excellent wines that will enhance your holiday seudah, make an impressive gift for your host or hostess and bring an international flair to your table.

ISRAEL: In his recent Rogov's Tasting Notes, Daniel Rogov, the internationally respected wine authority and Israel's most influential wine critic, described the Efrat Winery. "At the Israeli wine fair, more people were talking about the Efrat wineries than about anything else. I was thoroughly impressed by the vineyards, largely in the Ella Valley, very well located, not overly watered and well-tended vines," he wrote.

New from the Efrat Israeli series

Cabernet Sauvignon-Merlot, 2004, winner bronze medal: In Tasting Notes, Rogov said, "Young, fresh and lively, with soft tannins and an appealing berry-cherry personality. Hints of spices and Mediterranean herbs add complexity. Drink now."

Shiraz, 2004: Shiraz is a fruity wine with pleasant plum and wild berry fruits. Intense red colour and lovely purple hues.

ITALY: Two superb red wines include the Borgo Reale Sangiovese, a dry, medium-bodied red wine with a delicate bouquet and intense cherry fruit aromas, and the Borgo Reale Primitivo, full-bodied with smooth ripe jammy fruit flavours, along with hints of vanilla and rose petals. The Bartenura Asti is an exciting semisweet sparkling white wine with exceptional taste.

CHILE: Three notable wines include the Alfasi Cabernet Sauvignon, light-bodied with soft berry flavours, the Alfasi Merlot RSV (Reserve), full-bodied and aromatic with a touch of oak, and the Alfasi Merlot, dry, light-bodied with a taste of ripe berries.

FRANCE: The Cabaret Sauvignon, from the Herzog selection, is a light and delicately styled red wine with a soft flavour and smooth finish.

AUSTRALIA: The Altoona Hills Merlot is rich and complex, with layers of ripe plum and licorice flavours. Altoona Hills white wine, the Altoona Hills Chardonnay, has rich fruit flavours with hints of melon and peaches, along with subtle notes of vanilla and oak.

More than one way to bake challah

By MARCY GOLDMAN
Special to The CJN

Every time the occasion calls for challah, I look at my challah recipes and decide it's time to invent another challah, or at the very least, tweak perfection.

Instead of making the tried and true, I try yet another approach: more water, more yeast, less honey, more honey, fresh yeast, dry yeast, sponge-started challah and cool-rise challah.

At Rosh Hashanah, my interest in challah, notably the round, sweet New Year's version, is the greatest. It is the challah season. Ordinarily, that means a touch more honey and raisins to make a sweet, round challah, but to a baker, sweet challah means the sky is the limit.

All challah asks is a few basic things: warm water, great yeast (either compressed fresh or a fresh packet of instant or bread machine yeast), room temperature eggs and a fresh bag of unbleached bread flour.

When you do make challah, do remember two things. One, honey is an ideal sweetener and traditional, but it makes a more tacky dough. I use part honey and part sugar in my round New Year's challah for that reason. Two, challah is a heavy, rich dough. To get the best texture, mix up the dough very briefly and let it rest, covered for 15 minutes before continuing with the kneading. This ensures you do not add too much flour (the short rest helps the dough mature and "set up," so that it needs less flour added overall).

YOM KIPPUR BUTTERY DAIRY CHALLAH

Buttery challah seems almost a contradiction in terms, as challah is a non-dairy bread, making it appropriate to be served with a meat-based Sabbath meal. This is why vegetable oil is the usual fat in an authentic Sabbath challah. This bread, more appropriately called "egg bread," is suitable for dairy meals and uses butter to emphasize the bread's rich, velvety texture, resulting in a Jewish-style brioche. It is the perfect sandwich bread to accompany sliced fresh tomatoes or tuna salad, or as a lovely loaf offered after the Yom Kippur fast. This also makes fabulous rolls or egg twists.

1¼ cups warm water
2 tbsp. dry yeast
⅓ cup sugar
2½ tsp. salt
½ cup unsalted, melted butter
4 eggs
6-7 cups bread flour

Egg Wash
1 beaten egg
sesame or poppy seeds, optional, for sprinkling

Stir water and yeast together and let stand 5 minutes, until yeast swells or seems dissolved. Stir in remaining sugar, salt, melted butter and eggs to blend. Fold in flour to make a soft, shaggy mass. Knead 8-10 minutes, adding more flour as required to make a soft, elastic dough that does not stick to the mixing bowl.

Shape dough into ball and place it in a lightly greased bowl. Place bowl in a plastic bag and seal loosely. Let rise until almost doubled, about 45-90 minutes. Deflate gently.

There are two ways you can prepare the challah for baking. Divide dough in three, braid dough in traditional three strands and place on parchment-lined baking sheet. Brush with egg wash and sprinkle with poppy or sesame seeds. Insert baking sheet into a large, clear, plastic bag. Let rise until puffy and doubled in bulk.

Alternatively, spray a 12 x 5-inch loaf pan with non-stick cooking spray. Divide dough into three equal sections. Shape each into a smooth ball or slightly oval round. Place the balls of dough side by side in the prepared loaf pan, so that they are almost touching each other. Brush with egg wash and sprinkle on sesame seeds. Place loaf pan in a large plastic bag to rise until dough is almost flush with top of pan.

Preheat oven to 350. Place bread in oven and let bake until well browned, about 27-30 minutes for braided challah; 35-40 minutes for a loaf-style bread. Makes one large loaf.

CHOCOLATE CHIP CHALLAH

Simple, unique, so good! Add some cocoa for a chocolate challah or leave it out. The vanilla is optional – the bread is excellent with or without a touch of vanilla in the dough.

1½ cups warm water
2 tbsp. dry yeast
¾ cup sugar
½ cup oil
3 eggs
2 tsp. pure vanilla extract, optional
3 tbsp. cocoa (if you want a chocolate dough)
2¼ tsp. salt
6-8 cups bread flour
1 cup semi-sweet chocolate chips

Egg wash and garnish
1 egg, whisked
sugar for dusting top of bread

Generously spray one 5 x 12-inch loaf pan or two 9 x 5-inch loaf pans with non-stick cooking spray. You may also bake one or two freeform challah twists on a baking sheet.

In a large mixing bowl, briskly whisk together the water and yeast. Let stand to allow yeast to dissolve, about 2 minutes. Add in two cups of the flour, and then briskly stir in the sugar, oil, eggs, vanilla, cocoa (if you are using it) and salt, and most of the remaining flour. Mix, then knead on slowest speed of mixer to form a smooth but resilient dough (a soft but elastic bread dough). Add additional flour and knead 8-10 minutes.

Let dough rest 15 minutes and then press out on a lightly floured work surface. Press the chocolate chips into the dough, with fingers or a rolling pin, folding over dough to cover the chips.

Let dough rest 10 minutes and then form the dough into a ball, place it in a lightly greased bowl and place this in a plastic bag and seal loosely. Let rise until doubled, about 45 to 60 minutes.

Sweeten up your challah

Turn dough out onto a lightly floured work surface and gently deflate.

Again, there are two ways to form the bread. Divide into 6 pieces for two medium breads, or into 3 for one large bread. Form each portion into a rope and braid three together to make a braided bread.

Alternatively, you can form three balls of dough and place them beside each other in the prepared bread pans.

Whisk egg wash ingredients together. Brush on egg wash as thoroughly and generously as possible. As dough rises, you will have to reapply.

Place loaf pan(s) inside a large plastic bag to rise. Let rise until doubled or dough is puffy and has almost reached the top or is just above the top of the pan – 45 to 90 minutes. Brush tops again with egg wash and dust with sugar.

Preheat oven to 350. Place bread(s) in oven. Bake 40-45 minutes until well browned. If top of bread starts browning too quickly (before at least 40 minutes of baking time), cover lightly with a sheet of foil to protect top crust. Cool in pan 10 minutes before removing and cooling on a rack. Makes one large or two smaller loaves. Serve with butter or honey or sweetened cream cheese (flavoured with orange and cinnamon would be especially nice).

SWEET RAISIN CHALLAH ROLLS

Challah with a touch of vanilla in a raisin-studded sweet roll. Could anything be more comforting? These are perfect with cinnamon cream cheese, preserves or a pot of honey.

1½ cups warm water
2 tbsp. dry yeast
1 tbsp. pure vanilla extract
2 tbsp. honey
¼ cup sugar
3 eggs
⅓ cup oil
2½ tsp. salt
5-7 cups white bread flour, approximately 1½ cups plumped, dried raisins egg wash and coarse sugar

Line a large baking sheet with parchment paper. Set aside.

In a mixing bowl, hand whisk the water and yeast and let stand a few minutes. Whisk in the eggs, honey, sugar, vanilla, oil and salt and blend well. Add in all but 2-3 cups of flour and mix. Then attach the dough hook and knead to make a soft, bouncy dough, on lowest speed of mixer, 6-8 minutes, adding in raisins half way through.

Shape dough into a mound and insert entire mixing bowl in a large plastic bag. Let rise until almost doubled, 30-60 minutes.

Turn out onto a lightly floured work surface and deflate the dough. Cut the dough into 12 equal portions. Shape each into a small round roll or bun. Place on baking sheet, about 3 inches apart.

Insert the baking sheet into a large plastic bag and let rolls rise until quite puffy, about 30-45 minutes or until almost doubled.

Preheat oven to 375. Brush the bread with egg wash and dust on some coarse or regular sugar. Place the rolls in the oven (for loaf pan, place loaf pan on the baking sheet), and reduce the temperature to 350. Bake until nicely browned, about 25-28 minutes. Makes one dozen rolls.

HAPPY NEW YEAR

All about pomegranates

By ANN KLEINBERG
Special to The CJN

So how does a nice Jewish girl from New York with degrees in psychology and interior design, a Manhattan condo, a sports car and a parking spot for it, give it all up for a life in Israel? And while we're on the topic, how in the world did she get to write the world's first cookbook devoted to pomegranates? Funny you should ask.

I wasn't always a foodie person, and never for a moment did I foresee that I'd be writing cookbooks. But neither did I think I'd lose my size 10 figure. The writing came naturally, and the love of eating made it a no-brainer to ease into food writing.

First there were restaurant reviews (always gentle and positive), then commentary (in a Food for Thought column in the Jerusalem Post), then editing and translating cookbooks from Hebrew to English, and finally the magic moment that I didn't know I was waiting for. "Would you like to write a cookbook of pomegranate recipes?" My answer was an emphatic "Yes!"

You might want to know about the Upper West Side parking spot. (What in the world made me give that up?) Truthfully, I really don't know. Something happened to me in my 30s. The way I figured it was, if I had everything a girl could ever want and I was still thinking longingly of a little Mediterranean country on the other side of the Atlantic, then I figured I'd better go check things out. I did and here I am.

So there I was agreeing to write a cookbook – Pomegranates, published by Ten Speed Press – and to develop about 70 recipes using pomegranates as the main ingredient, or at least a significant ingredient.

Here's what I found out: pomegranates are great for you – really high in antioxidants. In Israel, research is being conducted on pomegranates and their positive effect on lowering the risks of heart disease, various forms of cancer and high blood pressure. They're considered to be aphrodisiacs, they're revered and treasured by many cultures (and have been for thousands of years), they're fun, and most important, they're delicious to eat on their own, fabulous to add to salads and amazing when added as an ingredient to stews, grains, desserts.

Now that the High Holy Day season is upon us, can you think a more appropriate food to accompany a Rosh Hashanah dinner? Here are some of my favorite recipes.

GEFILTE FISH IN POMEGRANATE, BEET AND HORSERADISH SAUCE

How could I possibly think of combining that quintessential of all Jewish foods, gefilte fish, with a Sephardi-inspired sauce with a kick. This is a special treat for readers because the recipe exists only in the Hebrew edition of the book (Rimonim – Hagigat shel Matkonim by Yediot Acharonot). Keep lots of challah on hand to mop up any leftover sauce!

4-6 portions prepared gefilte fish
3 tbsp. olive oil
1 red onion, chopped
1 carrot, peeled and cubed
3 cloves garlic, sliced
dash of kosher salt
dash of freshly ground black pepper
1/3 cup white wine
2 tbsp. sugar
1/4 cup pomegranate syrup
1/2 cup pomegranate juice
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1 cooked beet, cubed
1 heaping tsp. prepared red horseradish or 1 tsp. grated fresh
1/2 cup pomegranate seeds

My father Max Feig and his partners opened the first Open Window Bakery in 1957 on Bathurst Street, just south of Wilson. Everyone could see the baker in the back and Open Window Bakery was born.

Today, Open Window Bakery is run by our family. This January, we will celebrate 49 years of business and service in our community. My father remained active in his role as President of the company well into the 1990's. Today, he is semi-retired, but we still rely on his knowledge and wisdom about the bakery business. We look forward to celebrating our 50th Anniversary in January of 2007.

We are in a unique position in the baked goods industry because we manufacture, wholesale, distribute and retail a complete line of breads, buns, bagels, cakes and pastries. In the past, Open Window Bakery grew largely due to our corporate and franchise store operations. Customers enjoyed coming in to these locations and receiving personal attention with our quality products.

In the early 1990's, we noted that the supermarkets were growing in size. Whereas, they used to sell a limited selection of fruits, vegetables, meats, breads and cakes, they were beginning to buy and offer their customers better quality and choice in all products. At the same time, women were joining the work force in huge numbers. Less time for household chores and grocery shopping promoted the idea of one-stop shopping for working women. To satisfy their customer's taste for fresh quality baked goods, many supermarkets actually approached us to ask that we supply them with an assortment of our goods. Our customers had been asking them why they couldn't buy Open Window Bakery products in their stores.

Open Window Bakery followed this consumer trend to one-stop shopping through our sales to many supermarkets, both large and small. However, in some areas we still cater to our many customers who enjoy visiting their local bakery to plan their family meals. Each of our corporate and franchise stores offers our full line of products, along with a selection of groceries and prepared foods to complement our baked goods. Our customers appreciate the friendly service and personal care extended by our staff and franchise owners when they make their daily purchases or place their special holiday orders.

You can find a full selection of our delicious Open Window Bakery products at any of our corporate and franchise stores in Toronto. You can also purchase many of our products at select Loblaws, Fortino, Longo, Highland Farms, Sobeys, Galati, Concord and many other supermarkets, grocery and convenience stores and bakeries in the Greater Toronto area and now across southern Ontario.

My family and I, our staff and franchisees wish to thank you for your continued patronage. We look forward to serving you and your families for many years to come.

Sweet foods for ROSH HASHANAH

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Sweet foods are an important part of the Rosh Hashanah holiday and are tied to our wish for a sweet year. We dip apples and challah into honey and use dried and fresh fruits, sugar and honey to sweeten traditional dishes, including entrées, vegetables, salads and desserts. The challah is round instead of loaf-shaped to symbolize no beginning and no end. Raisins provide additional sweetness.

I am ordinarily not a big fan of tzimmes, but I was served this dish at a friend's home last year on Rosh Hashanah. The tzimmes, with its potato kugel topping was so delicious, that almost as soon as the holiday was over I called to get the recipe. There is a relatively long list of ingredients, but it's easy to make and almost a meal-in-one. You can make it and bring it to the table for serving in an attractive Dutch oven.

TZIMMES

3 lb. short ribs (flanken) or chuck, cut into 2-in. cubes
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
3 medium onions, sliced
2 tbsp. oil
6 cups water or beef bouillon to cover
3 large sweet potatoes, peeled and quartered
5 large carrots, peeled and quartered
3 large white potatoes, peeled and quartered
12 oz. dried prunes, pitted
12 oz. dried apricots
¼ cup brown sugar
¼ cup apricot jam (optional)
dash of nutmeg
½ tsp. cinnamon
juice of 1 lemon
slivered rind and juice of 1 orange

Potato Kugel Topping:
1 large peeled and grated white potato (about 2 cups)
2 cups matzah meal
2 eggs
2 tbsp. fresh parsley
1 onion, coarsely grated
1 tbsp. oil
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
½ cup water

Sprinkle the meat with the salt and pepper and brown, with the sliced onions, in the oil.

Place the meat, onions and juices in a large Dutch oven and cover it with the water or beef bouillon. Bake in a preheated oven at 350, covered, for 2 hours. Refrigerate overnight and remove the congealed fat. (This step is optional.)

Add the quartered vegetables with the prunes, apricots, brown sugar, apricot jam, nutmeg, cinnamon, lemon juice, and orange rind and juice to the meat. Add more water if too thick.

To make the topping, mix the grated potato with the matzah meal, eggs, parsley, onion, chicken fat or oil, and salt and pepper and up to ½ cup water, as needed, to make a sticky dough. Flour your hands and spread the potato dough and press very thinly over the tsimmes. Bake, covered, for 45 minutes.

Uncover, season with salt and pepper, and cook an additional 30 minutes or until the liquid disappears and the top turns crusty. Serves 10-12.

Wow your guests with exotic salad

Heat oil in a saucepan over high heat. Add the onion, carrot and garlic. Sauté over medium heat until the onion turns golden and the carrots start to soften.

Add the salt, pepper, wine, sugar, pomegranate syrup and pomegranate juice. Return to high heat until the mixture starts to boil and then lower heat and simmer until the mixture is reduced by one third. Add lemon juice, beets and horseradish and cook for an additional 5 minutes. At the very end, add pomegranate seeds and remove from heat.

Arrange gefilte fish on individual serving plates. Pour sauce over each piece of fish and serve. Serves 4.

DRUNKEN FIGS WITH ROQUEFORT IN POMEGRANATE SYRUP

There is nothing that compares to the taste of rich, creamy cheese combined with a luscious fresh fig. Add Marsala and pomegranate syrup and seeds, and you're in for a real treat.

8 fresh figs
1/3 cup cream cheese
1/4 cup any combination of kosher Roquefort, Gorgonzola and goat cheese, at room temperature
1 tbsp. olive oil
1 clove garlic, crushed
1/3 cup pomegranate seeds
1/3 cup kosher Marsala wine
2 tbsp. pomegranate syrup

Preheat the broiler. Cut an X in the top of each fig, slicing halfway down so that the sides open up like petals.

Combine the cheeses, olive oil and garlic in a mini-food processor or a small bowl and mix well. Fold in the pomegranate seeds. Carefully spoon about 1 tbsp. of the cheese mixture into each fig. Place the stuffed figs in a baking pan.

Combine the Marsala and pomegranate syrup in a small bowl and drizzle over the tops of the figs. Place under the broiler for about 2 minutes, or just until the cheese melts. Makes a great appetizer or finger food at a cocktail party.

MIXED BERRY AND POMEGRANATE COULIS

This is a fabulous sauce that goes with just about anything sweet – make it and keep it on hand to pour over waffles, vanilla ice cream, cream puffs, fruit salad – use your imagination – the possibilities are endless.

1/3 cup pomegranate juice
1/2 cup dry red wine, like cabernet sauvignon
3 tbsp. sugar
1 (1-in.-long) cinnamon stick
2 tbsp. crème de cassis (blackcurrent liqueur)
1 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
2 tsp. vanilla extract
3 cups frozen mixed berries

Combine the pomegranate juice, wine, sugar and cinnamon stick in a small saucepan. Bring to a boil over high heat, then decrease the heat to simmer, and cook until the liquid is reduced by half.

Add the crème de cassis, lemon juice, vanilla and frozen berries. Cook just until the berries are thawed and then remove from the heat. If not using immediately, let cool, cover and refrigerate until ready to use. The coulis can be reheated or served cold. Makes about 2 1/2 cups.

ENDIVE, AVOCADO AND GRAPEFRUIT SALAD

If you have five minutes to spare, you can create the most beautiful and delicious salad. So few ingredients for such simple perfection!

2 heads of endive, trimmed and washed
1 fresh avocado, sliced
1 red grapefruit, cut into sections, membranes removed
1/2 cup pomegranate seeds
fresh cilantro leaves for garnish pomegranate syrup vinaigrette (recipe follows)

Arrange endive leaves on individual serving plates, top with grapefruit sections and avocado pieces. Sprinkle with pomegranate seeds and garnish with cilantro leaves. Drizzle the vinaigrette over the salad and serve.

Pomegranate Syrup Vinaigrette

Feel free to experiment with other ingredients such as raspberry vinegar, walnut oil, or honey.

1/4 cup extra-virgin olive oil
1/4 cup canola oil
2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar

In Honour of Michael Kafka ז"ל

We would like to take this opportunity to thank all family and friends for honouring my husband, Michael Kafka ז"ל.

The sudden passing of my beloved Michael was devastating and his absence is excruciatingly painful but what fills my heart is the abundance and outpouring of love and support by so many family and friends. Just by the sheer number of people who came to pay their respects is overwhelming. From the Shiva dinners to the most generous and staggering amount of donations to charity, (that continue to arrive on a daily basis), in honour of Michael is so awe-inspiring and comforts us during this very difficult time. We are deeply humbled, proud and honoured.

Also we must mention how grateful we are to Rabbi Morrison and the Beth Emeth community who embraced us as their own. Their recognition of our grief and their unconditional support during this time helps us slowly heal this very deep and sorrowful wound.

In closing, we want to wish all of our family and friends a very healthy and happy New Year, Shana Tova.

Thank you all again so very much for your support and love. We all miss Michael dearly but he's never far from our thoughts and forever lives in our hearts.

Rabbi led S. African Jews into post-apartheid era

By PAUL SHAVIV
Special to The CJN

The chief rabbi emeritus of South Africa, Rabbi Cyril Harris, passed away in South Africa on Sept. 13, a few days before his 69th birthday, after a year-long battle with cancer.

Rabbi Harris was a colourful and impressive personality who, after a hugely popular rabbinic career in England, led South Africa's Jewish community during the historic process of transition from apartheid to a democratic order.

Born in Scotland, he was one of a dynamic group of young rabbis who graduated from Jews' College, the British rabbinical seminary, in the 1960s. A superb orator, he could be fiery when the occasion demanded, but he could also quote poetry from the pulpit, in his Scottish accent, to a spellbound congregation.

Guest Voice

In the United Kingdom, he made his reputation in the London suburb of Kenton, where he built a large, young community. He was a wonderful teacher, and for years taught teenagers at the summer and winter schools of the Jewish Youth Study Groups.

His involvement with young people led him to take the radical step of leaving the pulpit and becoming director of London Hillel in the early 1970s. As well as exerting a charismatic influence on students, Rabbi Harris did a great deal to strengthen the fundraising and community support for Hillel in England at a crucial time in its history.

Rabbi Cyril Harris

Within two or three years, however, the pulpit called again, and he moved first to another large suburban synagogue, Edgware, and then to the prestigious St. John's Wood Synagogue nearer to the centre of London.

Toward the end of the 1980s, his name began to be mentioned as a contender for the post of chief rabbi of the United Kingdom, which was due to become vacant on the retirement of Chief Rabbi Lord Immanuel Jakobovits.

In what many saw as a tactical move, in 1987, Rabbi Harris accepted the post of chief rabbi of South Africa, which positioned him as a candidate for the larger U.K. post.

In the end, Jonathan Sacks became the British chief rabbi, and – fortuitously – Rabbi Harris remained in South Africa. In the momentous times of the early 1990s, he became a crucial moral, religious and political influence during the transition of power, leading the Jewish community with great skill through what could have been vulnerable circumstances.

As chief rabbi, he forged relationships with black leaders – most importantly, he developed a warm personal friendship with Nelson Mandela, who became South Africa's first post-apartheid president in 1994.

When Mandela married his second wife, he moved part of the celebrations from Saturday to Friday in order to allow Rabbi Harris to bless the couple.

Dr. Elie Cass, physician, coroner and mohel, died last week. He was 82.

He died in the intensive care unit of Mount Sinai Hospital, where, in 1953, he was one of its first interns.

Cass was born in Toronto, the youngest in a family of 10 children. After serving in the Air Force during World War II, he returned home and attended medical school.

His family practice lasted for 52 years, until just before his final illness. As a mohel, he was said to have performed more than 50,000 ritual circumcisions. In recent years, he performed a number of ritual circumcisions on Muslim boys as well.

One of his interests as a physician was the treatment and relief of pain. He became interested in the Chinese technique of acupuncture and went to study it formally in France. He used it in his practice, worked to get it accepted here and founded the Acupuncture Foundation of Canada.

Cass was also interested in the treatment of migraines and was a founder of the Migraine Foundation of Canada.

He served as a coroner for the County of York where he strongly opposed the abuse of children and women and police mistreatment of prisoners. He also fought for better safety standards in the workplace, in construction and on the water.

In spite of his exhausting schedule, his family said he made time for them, for teaching bar mitzvah lessons, for reading and for chess.

A passionate supporter of Israel, Cass frequently participated in missions there with other doctors.

Cass was predeceased by his wife Devy. He is survived by sons Paul and his wife Eva, Charles and David and his wife Mirjana; sisters Zelda Fink, Betty Heller and Miriam Cass, brother Al and three grandchildren.

THANK YOU
to my more than 67 friends who sponsored me on the 60 km END CANCER WALK. It was a very emotional experience. Having put in over 500 kms in training walks, it was still a challenge, that I was able to face because of the overwhelming moral support you have given me. Without you, I could not have raised 7 times more than the amount set to participate, that I achieved, thanks to your very generous donations. I hope that my contribution, and yours, will help "FIND THE CURE".

Prof pushes to keep York U open on High Holy Days

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A York University professor is waging a campaign to end the school's longstanding practice of cancelling classes on Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and other religious holidays because he says it's against the law.

York history professor David Noble – who generated controversy last year when he alleged that the York University Foundation, the school's fundraising arm, is biased by "the presence and influence of staunch pro-Israel lobbyists, activists and fundraising agencies" – has called on Queen's Park to force York to stop cancelling classes on non-statutory religious holidays.

"It's illegal," Noble said when asked why he is pursuing the matter. "It's a no-brainer. There is no debate here."

In an open letter this month to York University president Lorna Marsden, Noble said that to prohibit holding classes on religious holidays violates the 1965 York University Act, which he noted contains a clause forbidding "the imposition upon any member of the university community of 'any religious observances according to the regulations of any particular denomination or sect.'"

Not satisfied with the university's response after repeated requests to change the policy, Noble, who is Jewish, said he will protest by scheduling classes on the High Holy Days and Good Friday. (Good Friday is a statutory holiday in Ontario, while Easter Monday is not.)

"A year has passed now since I wrote to you and no corrective action has been taken, by neither the senate nor the administration, to bring the schedule into compliance with the statute," he wrote to Marsden. "I have decided, therefore, to take lawful action myself and to encourage colleagues to do the same, by holding classes on the designated religious holidays when these coincide with regularly scheduled sessions."

However, Noble said he won't penalize observant students who can't attend.

York has not held classes on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur since 1974 in recognition of the fact it has a large number of Jewish students and faculty. It's believed to have more Jewish students – 5,000, almost 10 per cent of its total – than any other Canadian university.

Chris Morley, a spokesperson for Premier Dalton McGuinty, said cancelling classes on holidays "is a decision the university has the authority to make," adding that "it seems the York policy is reasonable."

York spokesperson Nancy White said the senate and administration reviewed the policy about 10 years ago and decided to continue with it.

"In no way does this practice undermine the York Act. That section [that Noble refers to] is not intended to apply to this matter," White said.

She said a senate subcommittee has prepared a report on the issue that it will table this week.

Prof. Martin Lockshin, an observant Jew who teaches at York and is on the university's senate, said that although the school has taken Noble's complaint very seriously, he would be surprised if the practice changed.

Marsden asked the senate to study the matter, Lockshin said, adding he has learned the subcommittee's report "suggests that no change should be made to the current practice."

He said the university is entitled to make rules about when classes are held.

"If I wanted to schedule a class on Sunday, the university could tell me I'm not allowed to. I also wake up at about five in the morning and I wouldn't mind teaching at six in the morning, but the university won't let me."

He added that the holiday policy follows a general York principle of respecting religious diversity, but more importantly, it avoids problems that would be created when many students and faculty can't attend class.

"If you have a university with a small number of Jewish faculty members and Jewish students, then there is no need to accommodate the small number. But when you have a university with a large percentage, it is in the self-interest of the university to avoid havoc."

For the same reason, he said it's not practical to have classes on Christian holidays.

"It would create such a mess if I held a class and all the Christians didn't show up because they were in church for Good Friday."

Frat boys more than just party animals

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Fraternities often conjure an image of beer-guzzling, womanizing college-age boys who want nothing more to worry about but where the next kegger is going to be.

But Kobi Gulersen, a fourth-year biology student at the University of Toronto who is the vice-president of its Alpha Epsilon Pi fraternity, has worked hard to change that image.

Although AEPi is known as "the largest party-throwing group on campus," getting drunk and meeting girls is low on the priority list for Toronto's 80 members.

Each year, AEPi International chooses a charity to which each chapter has to make an effort to contribute, Gulersen said. One year they raised money for the Ethiopian Jews in Israel and another year for Magen David Adom.

Some chapters, he added, like U of T's Tau Omega, go above and beyond the minimum and choose to raise money for local charities as well.

In the past, Tau Omega raised money for the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation, the Sick Kids Foundation and the Canadian Red Cross.

"I would argue our frat has changed the image of fraternities across campus. We are unofficially known as the 'Jewish frat that throws good parties,' but besides that we raise a lot of money for charities and we have a great time putting on the parties," he said.

He added that because the university doesn't recognize fraternities on campus, all of the funding comes from internal sources and sponsors such as Juicy Couture, Virgin Music and Capitol Records.

It costs nearly $5,000 to throw a party, he said. Every penny they profit goes to a charity of their choice.

Last year, they were able to raise $7,000 for the Diabetes Hope Foundation and create a scholarship for students struggling with the financial burden of treating diabetes.

Gulersen said the Diabetes Hope Foundation is meant to assist students who must pay about $2,000 a year for the proper equipment needed to treat the disease.

Last year, the Alpha Epsilon Pi 2005 scholarship, which ranges between $2,500 and $3,500, was awarded to Kale Boehmer, who was one of 31 recipients.

Gulersen hopes that with some of the proceeds left over from last year's fundraiser, coupled with what he hopes to raise this year, AEPi will be able to create more Diabetes Hope Foundation scholarships.

Supports Diabetes Foundation

Gulersen said that aside from it being a great cause, the people at the foundation are great to work with.

"We chose to support the Diabetes Hope Foundation because they have the lowest administrative costs at 20 per cent. Many charities take about 40 or 50 per cent."

Gulersen hopes the event, "Legacy," which will be held at Level Nightclub in downtown Toronto on Sept. 22, will draw a capacity crowd of about 1,500 people from York University, Ryerson University and, of course, U of T.

"This is the first event of the year. The kickoff event. Because no one has a lot of work to do yet, we expect a lot of people to come out," he said.

"It's a fun way to usher in the new year and it's for a great charity."

"I do this all because I love to do it. I love the idea of throwing these large- scale events that have never been done. The corporations are happy because they get huge exposure, the clubs are happy because they are making money, the charities are happy because we are contributing to their cause and everyone that comes out is happy because they get to attend an amazing party."

Dalhousie dedicates school to Medjuck

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Surrounded by family and friends, Halifax businessman, lawyer and developer Ralph Medjuck proudly listened to the speeches as the refurbished Dalhousie University School of Architecture and Planning building was named in his honour.

The recent ceremony was chaired by Dalhousie president Tom Traves who called Medjuck "a remarkable friend of the university, a creator, an urban developer who has, many times, organized the interests to move projects forward. He has built attractive and useful buildings."

Ralph Medjuck

Medjuck, a graduate of Dalhousie in commerce and law, made a $2 million campaign contribution to refurbish the school of architecture. He has supported scholarships at Dalhousie, served on its board of governors, and was often a guest lecturer at the school because of his 40-year career in developing office and apartment buildings and hotels in Halifax, Sydney and Toronto through his company, Centennial Properties Ltd.

"He was an active partner in the development of this building," said Traves. "He insisted the work was done to the highest standards. His vision, deep knowledge and drive for excellence will inspire our students to become the success he is."

Medjuck, who grew up a few hundred metres from Dalhousie's campus in Halifax's south end, said he owes much to the university.

"Many in my family graduated from Dal and are now engineers and lawyers and influences in their communities. Dalhousie was the foundation for their creative results," he said.

Medjuck has been an active and supportive member of the Halifax Jewish community, serving on the board of Beth Israel Synagogue and chairing and supporting numerous national and international fundraising campaigns.

Known as much for his business acumen as his development skills, Medjuck told more than 100 guests at the ribbon-cutting that he has always found architecture students thirsty for knowledge and curious about creating value and equity in the buildings they design.

"But they should be taught [how to carry on and make dealings in] business. Having said that, maybe they'll invite me back to speak to classes again," he said, tongue-in-cheek.

Grant Wanzel, dean of the school of architecture, thanked Medjuck for "allowing your distinguished name to be connected to our building.

"Maybe we'll take you up on that offer [to speak to the students again]."

Why We Think Synagogue Is So Important

There is no institution that unites Jews across the centuries and across borders like a shul does. A synagogue can simultaneously be "home" to a Jew from Cairo and one from Casablanca, a Jewish family from Argentina and another from North York or Richmond Hill. We are part of synagogue life because we want to be part of the Jewish people personally, not just statistically.

Our synagogues are open places of community, study and prayer. The synagogue connects us with our past and also with the present. In other places, we meet our fellow Jews as clients and competitors, but in synagogue, we meet them as partners, members of one family. We are connected to each other and responsible for one another.

In our fast-paced, mobile world, we need a place where matters of true importance are raised above items that are merely urgent. The synagogue is the place where shared communal issues and ideas are given priority over the "me first" focus of a consumer-driven society. If Jewish people have always needed a sense of community, how much more so today!

Synagogue has been central to the Jewish past, anchors our present, and should be part of your future. We need you. The Jewish people need you. Join us, help us and work with us. We are stronger when we are together.

Announcement sent shock waves through community

McGuinty asserted to CP that "there will be no religious arbitration in Ontario. There will be one law for all Ontarians." His move capped two years of often acrimonious debate in Ontario over a proposal from Muslim groups to set up tribunals similar to the beit din that would employ sharia, or Islamic law.

Opponents of sharia-style courts feared the tribunals would discriminate against women – especially immigrants and those in more traditional, closed communities – in disputes involving abuse, divorce, child custody and inheritance.

McGuinty also apparently rejected a report by former Ontario attorney general Marion Boyd, who recommended that sharia courts be permitted as long as certain "safeguards" were enforced. Boyd's report contained 46 recommendations, many of which were welcomed by Jewish officials who had briefed her on how a beit din works.

The premier's announcement sent shock waves through the Jewish community, with some officials initially fearing that a complete end to beit dins would mean Jewish women would no longer be able to obtain a get, the Jewish divorce decree.

Media reports also reinforced the belief that McGuinty's proposed ban would include all aspects of rabbinical courts, which have functioned in Ontario for more than 100 years.

Those fears were assuaged somewhat last week. Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, secretary of the beit din of Toronto's Vaad Harabonim, said McGuinty's announcement will have no effect on the granting of gets.

There are two beit dins in Toronto, Rabbi Tradburks explained, and Jewish divorces are issued by the separate Beth Din Zedek, overseen by Rabbi Mordechai Ochs.

Rabbi Ochs told The CJN that his court issues about 150 writs of divorce a year in Toronto, and rarely gets involved in financial issues.

As well, the government's move will have no effect on the 1990 amendments to the federal Divorce Act, which required husbands to remove all religious obstacles before a civil divorce can be granted, Rabbi Tradburks noted.

He said it's his understanding that McGuinty's pledge will affect only family law. At Toronto's beit din, a minority of cases involve family issues – mainly fallout from failed marriages.

"As I understand it, the premier's proposal applies only to family law cases and issues arising from divorce, such as [child] custody, division of assets and inheritance."

Toronto's beit din receives between 75 and 100 inquiries a year. "Our first avenue is to try and settle. Over half of these I never hear from again."

About 25 or 30 cases wind up before a formal sitting of the rabbinical court, with most involving commercial, business and labour disputes.

Rabbi Tradburks said he believes these cases will still have the force of the Arbitration Act behind them and that the beit din's rulings in these matters will remain binding.

But if the ban goes beyond family issues, "this is not a good thing at all. It's a very bad thing because that will severely handicap the enforceability [of rulings] and hence people's confidence in the enforceability of any decision of the beit din."

Both Rabbi Tradburks and Rabbi Ochs said observant Jews will continue using Jewish courts whether or not rulings are legally binding in a secular court. Rabbi Tradburks cited the beit din's "moral suasion" as a compelling force.

On the other hand, "if someone goes to a beit din and there's no enforcement, they may feel they're wasting their time." As well, less observant Jews would feel free to ignore the beit din's finding.

By the same token, secular courts would be less likely to refer matters to a diminished beit din, he added.

Rabbi Tradburks also fears that a casualty of McGuinty's move could be Jews who cannot afford the secular system.

"My concern is that some poor Jews will be forced to go to the secular court and pay lawyers." The Toronto beit din charges $125 per fifing, and $150 per party.

Steven Shulman of Canadian Jewish Congress's Ontario region, called McGuinty's decision "a knee-jerk reaction to a lot of public noise and without due process... all faith groups have been tarred with the same brush."

He said CJC is seeking a meeting with the premier and that it's "premature" to discuss a legal challenge.

Shulman said it's also his understanding that a ban on religious arbitration would extend only to family law. "It will create more of a question mark as to whether rulings will be binding."

Karen Lazar of B'nai Brith Canada said her organization is continuing to study the issue and is "exploring options," including the possibility of a court challenge under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

B'nai Brith leaders have also requested a meeting with McGuinty and have said they do not believe his decision is final.

John Syrtash, a Toronto family lawyer who has represented clients before the beit din, said flatly there is "no question that McGuinty's steps are completely unconstitutional, against the Charter of Rights and will be struck down by the Supreme Court of Canada at the first opportunity."

Syrtash said the move was "just another example of this government's true contempt for the Ontario Jewish community and its values."

Rabbi Ochs called McGuinty's decision "an outrage."

"Why should they support secular but not religious arbitration?" he asked. " If people voluntarily submit to arbitration, how can the government step in and say, 'No, no, you can only go to the secular one'? It's crazy. It's discrimination."

Student enrolment down slightly at Winnipeg's largest Jewish day school

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Three years of steady enrolment growth – fuelled by large-scale Jewish immigration from Argentina and an influx of Russian Jews from Israel – has ended for Winnipeg's largest Jewish day school.

Enrolment this September at the Board of Jewish Education's Grey Academy, whose students range from kindergarten to Grade 12, is 620, more than 30 fewer students than last year.

The decline is partly due to a slowdown in Argentine immigration following the arrival of some 100 families in the city from Buenos Aires over the past five years.

At the same time, 30 Russian Israeli families chose not to enrol their children – most of them high school students – for a second year because of cost. The school waives tuition for children of first-year immigrants, but families are expected to pay at least $750 per child in their second year at the school.

School principal Rory Paul said full tuition is $6,325 per student, but the BJE has a sliding scale based on family income and the number of students each family enrols at Grey.

He added that this year's Grade 12 class has 34 students, a few less than last year's record-sized class.

While Grey Academy is registering a small enrolment decline, Winnipeg's other Jewish day school programs are seeing increases.

The free program at Brock Corydon Elementary School in south Winnipeg, one of two public schools that offer half-day Hebrew bilingual instruction, has 172 students this year, up from 168 last year. There are 25 children in the kindergarten, about the same as last year.

The school also has a new principal.

Free public school programs see increase

Ira Udow, who came to came to Brock Corydon in March, has been a principal in the Winnipeg public school system for the last nine years, and he's known in the Jewish community as the chazzan at Temple Shalom, Winnipeg's Reform congregation.

Margaret Park Elementary School in north Winnipeg, the area's main Jewish day school, is celebrating a 30 per cent increase in enrolment this year. Thanks largely to an influx of Russian Israeli children, the school's Hebrew bilingual program's enrolment has reached 100 for the first time in four years – reversing a steady nine-year decline. Last year, the program had just 77 students, including six in kindergarten. This year's kindergarten class is 11.

(The majority of young Jewish families now live in south Winnipeg, and almost all the new Argentine families have settled there.)

There are also two Orthodox day schools in the city. Ohr haTorah, which holds classes at Herzlia Synagogue in south Winnipeg, starts the year with a new principal, Rabbi David Weksler from Bnei Brak. Going into its eighth year, the school has 25 preschoolers and another 20 students in grades 1 through 8. Rabbi Weksler said he hopes to build enrolment during his tenure.

The other Orthodox elementary school, located in north Winnipeg, is a long-running Chabad program for the city's small number of Chabad families.

Na'amat names new president at national conference

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — After 30 years with Na'amat Canada, Esther Rodzynek, an occupational therapist from Toronto, was named the organization's president at its recent conference.

As part of her position, she anticipates travelling across the country and to Israel representing Na'amat, whose mandate is to enhance and safeguard the status of women, children and families in Israel and in Canada.

Rodzynek, 58, born in Germany to Holocaust survivors, said that since joining Na'amat, she has been interested in women's issues and supporting and defending Israel.

Esther Rodzynek

Now at the helm of the organization for a three-year term, she hopes to increase its awareness and encourage more tourism to Israel. In February, she plans to lead a mission trip to Israel.

Na'amat, she says, brings women's issues to the forefront, and helps protect those who may not know their rights, and operates a state-the-art women's shelter in Tel Aviv.

"A lot of women don't know what their rights are," says Rodzynek, a former chair of Na'amat's coalition for agunot.

"People in Israel have the same problems as people in Canada. By helping there, we can help here. I'm interested in the world and women's role in the world."

She lived in Israel for two years, she says, after moving there in 1972 to work at the Beit Levenstein hospital. She joined Na'amat upon returning home.

She has returned to Israel a number of times on missions, leadership excursions and personal trips with her family.

Rodzynek, a mother of three and grandmother of one, is a former board member of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, and still volunteers for Meals on Wheels.

Na'amat's head office is in Montreal, she says, but she will continue to live in Toronto. With "e-mail, faxes and cell phones, it should be fine," she says.

'Indifference is a sin,' Wiesel tells Ottawa Jews

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A sense of solidarity is what has held the Jewish people together over the centuries through many attempts to destroy us, Nobel Peace Prize winner Elie Wiesel told the kickoff to the Ottawa Jewish community's fundraising campaign earlier this month.

Speaking to a rapt audience of more than 1,300 people at the city's Westin Hotel, Wiesel said that "logically, the Jewish people should have, could have, disappeared long ago.

"What is the secret to our continuation? Is it religion? Is it culture? Is it a passion for learning? Is it prayer? It surely is a sense of solidarity… somehow, when a Jewish community suffers, others felt it…we have always felt the necessity of showing our commitment to God by showing a commitment to each other."

"We need to be part of that experience of sharing, of saying that if somebody is there with an open hand, I must put something there. If somebody is there with an open heart, I must feel it. Otherwise, what is life?"

There are so many tragedies in the world, and we must all do what we can to help, because indifference is "the great evil," said Wiesel, a Holocaust survivor and a professor at Boston University.

[Peter Waiser photo]

"Indifference is not only a sin, it is also a punishment," he said. "Indifference to terrorism is not an answer. It can happen anywhere. It does happen anywhere."

Education is the key to fighting indifference, intolerance and hatred, the world-renowned author said. "It takes years, but we should invest those years in our students."

A close friend of the late Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, Wiesel spoke of the horror of Rabin's assassination and its repercussions for Israel.

Wiesel does, however, believe that there will be peace in Israel. "I don't know how long it will last, but there will be peace," he said.

"Whatever happens in Israel, we must believe that it happens to us as well."

The Sept. 7 event was attended by Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, a long-time friend of Wiesel, of whom he spoke fondly; by Supreme Court justices Rosalie Abella and Morris Fish; by several members of the diplomatic community; and by a number of local politicians and dignitaries.

The Jewish Federation of Ottawa's 2006 campaign, chaired by Neil Shinder and Barbara Crook, hopes to raise $5 million.

In his remarks, Shinder urged the audience "to carry [Wiesel's] messages beyond tonight, and into our lives and those around us… Tonight is the kickoff of our annual Jewish federation campaign, where we build community and strengthen our institutions so that indifference will never lead to events such as those our esteemed speaker endured in his teenage years."

Federation chair Ron Prehogan reminded the audience that "part of what it means to be a growing and responsible Jewish community is that we contribute not only toward Jewish causes but as well to people in need all over the world," and he urged the community to also donate to the humanitarian relief fund established by the United Jewish Communities of North America to help victims of Hurricane Katrina.

Protest 'meant to send McGuinty a message'

Some protesters said it was inappropriate for a Jewish human rights group to honour a premier who has caused pain in the Jewish community.

"B'nai Brith does wonderful work," said demonstrator Jerrold Landau, who has three children attending Eitz Chaim Day School. "We're not protesting B'nai Brith, but I have to say that on this, they made a mistake. This [protest] is meant to send Dalton McGuinty a message."

That message was intended to remind McGuinty of his statements after he abruptly announced on Sept. 11 that faith-based arbitration will no longer operate under the authority of the provincial Arbitration Act, ending the legal enforceability of decisions by Jewish rabbinical courts.

The move was in response to growing protest over the proposal to set up sharia-based tribunals to legally arbitrate private disputes between Muslims.

"There will be one law for all Ontarians," McGuinty told Canadian Press.

If that's the case, "he should be funding all schools, not just Catholics," Landau said.

Landau added that several weeks ago, he and a group of funding activists met with B'nai Brith Canada executive vice-president Frank Dimant to ask why McGuinty would occupy a place of honour at the dinner.

"We got no conclusive answer."

In a CJN interview, Dimant wondered: "I just want to know if this is going to become a pattern, that when a representative of the government of Ontario appears at any Jewish function – be it federation, Hadassah, B'nai Brith, [Canadian] Zionist Federation – will the same protesters now come out?

"Is it now going to be the policy that when we deal with the government on numerous issues and when we meet with cabinet ministers at our buildings, that we anticipate there will be a demonstration? I'm quite frankly surprised at that."

Dimant said he understands parents' concerns, but "we have to understand that organizations such as B'nai Brith, [Canadian Jewish] Congress, federation, deal with the government on a multitude of issues. And I'm not sure that all of the demonstrators fully understood all of the issues involved and what it means to actually create a precedent for demonstrations outside Jewish events."

Demonstrators got a boost by the surprise visit of Ontario Conservative leader John Tory.

Tory told The CJN he came by to support the parents. He said a Conservative government "is going to restore some measure of assistance" to those paying tuition in private schools. "I understand their concern."

Tory said he's examining income testing of parents and "adequate accountability" by private schools.

Marriage Registry Projects provides families with links to the past

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For Cheryl Barish, the Jewish Heritage Centre's (JHC) new Marriage Registry Project couldn't have come at a better time.

"We had just moved my father [Danny Gutkin] into the Sharon Home [Winnipeg's Jewish seniors extended care home] and my mother [Dorothy Gutkin] into the Portsmouth [an apartment complex for seniors].

"In the process of moving, we came across their wedding album. The letter about the Jewish Heritage Centre project came in the middle of all that," Barish says.

Dr. Barry Stronger also thinks the project, which provides families with a record of their parents' marriage records, is fantastic.

"It's quite a memory," says the retired dentist. "I have my copy framed and on the wall next to a framed copy of my family tree."

Stronger and Barish are two of the close to 30 individuals or families who purchased copies of their parents' wedding registers from the JHC, which kicked off the new fundraising project in conjunction with the opening of its new Jewish Bridal Exhibit on July 27.

The project is based on the marriage register maintained by Rabbi Israel Kahanovitch, Winnipeg's chief rabbi from 1918 to 1948, for the years 1931 to 1946.

"He must have performed 1,200 to 1,500 marriages during that time and he kept detailed records," says Gerry Posner, a JHC past president and board member who came up with the idea for the project.

"There are the names of the bride and groom, their parents, their birthplaces and their occupations. When we package the information with wedding photos, we have pieces of family history that a lot of family members may not have."

Posner's idea was to provide framed copies of individual marriage registers to couples such as Barish's parents who were married by Rabbi Kahanovitch 63 years ago, or children and grandchildren of couples whom Rabbi Kahanovitch married.

When Rabbi Kahanovitch married Stronger's parents, Max and Bessie, in 1939, they were already in their late 30s, and Max died at a young age. Barry was 19 when his father died.

"I decided to participate in the project as soon as I got Gerry's letter," Stronger says. "I am pleased with how the package turned out."

Barish says the package she received was "nicely done. The information is clearly laid out."

Realtor Lorne Weiss learned about the project when he ran into Posner while out for a walk. "Gerry asked me if I was related to Sam and Sarah Weiss. When I told him they were my parents, he told me about the project.

"I was intrigued. I saw it as a wonderful opportunity to solidify my family history. My mother is at an age when she doesn't remember things so clearly. So this is great for her. And it gives my children a stronger link to their grandparents."

Posner reports that he has sent out quite a number of letters to families who might be interested in acquiring a piece of their family history.

The JHC is asking $100 for each copy. Purchasers receive a tax receipt for $70. Funds raised will go toward helping support the Bridal Exhibition.

KATRINA AID: Students from the Associated Hebrew Schools' Danilack Middle School are seen with the bins of clothing they have so far collected to send to survivors of Hurricane Katrina. Students from grades 1 to 8 in all three Associated branches are involved in this project. Seen from left are Yael Spiegel, Nava Rosen, Katie Berman, Leeat Perlman and Ariel Dishy.

Committed to social justice

Rabbi Harris was totally committed to social justice, and was co-chair of MaAfrica Tikkun, the Jewish community's foundation that promotes nation-building activities in the new South Africa.

Throughout his career, Rabbi Harris was supported by his wife, Anne, a distinguished lawyer in her own right, and his sons Michael (a rabbi in London) and Jonathan. He represented an open-minded, and an increasingly rare, modern Orthodox rabbinic profile of wide horizons, pastoral care, and visionary political and social conscience. He leaves many friends and admirers – former congregants and former students – in the United Kingdom, South Africa and around the world.

Paul Shaviv is director of education at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and a friend and former colleague of Rabbi Harris.

Katrina Aftermath

How does a Jewish community rebuild itself?

By GAIL NARON CHALEW
Baltimore Jewish Times

Ilan Bissinger was installed as the new president of the New Orleans Jewish Federation in an unconventional way earlier this month.

At the exact time when the federation's annual meeting was scheduled to have taken place, he was having dinner in Baton Rouge with his predecessor, Bobby Garon, and several representatives of United Jewish Communities, the national organization for Jewish federations.

In lieu of a gavel, Garon handed Bissinger a napkin wrapped around silverware and thus passed him the reins of leadership.

Bissinger is living in Baton Rouge temporarily, and the offices of the New Orleans federation are based in Houston, while the members of the New Orleans Jewish community are now living in 70 communities across the country.

This is definitely not business as usual.

When asked how the federation is handling this unprecedented situation, Sherri Tarr, its former women's campaign and young leadership director, said, "With a lot of patience, not much sleep and lots of sechel [common sense]."

In the first few days after Hurricane Katrina, pikuach nefesh, the Jewish concept of the sanctity of a human life, was the Jewish federation's first priority.

Winnipeg native Adam Bronstone, its director of community relations, worked closely with the National Guard to direct it to the homes of stranded Jewish elderly shut-ins and helping in the evacuation to Houston of 300 residents of the Jewish nursing home, Woldenberg Village. Unfortunately, two residents died en route.

Once everyone was evacuated, the focus shifted to finding out where people relocated and helping people find their family and friends.

Just managing the flood of communication – from those offering to help and those needing help – has been overwhelming.

Eric Stillman, executive director of the New Orleans Jewish Federation, likens it to a "tsunami of communication, which has erupted from having 10,000 Jews scattered all across the country. Managing it requires a corps of volunteers from Houston and from New Orleans who have resettled in Houston."

The Jewish federation is also serving as a clearinghouse for community resources, matching people with available housing and jobs.

As they entered the third week of the post-Katrina era, the federation and its agencies were shifting focus once again, moving beyond survival needs to assessing the damage and planning for the future.

The Jewish communal professionals charged with running these agencies are also gaining focus as well. As Deena Gerber, executive director of New Orleans' Jewish Family Service who is now living in Atlanta with her son and his family, said, "Before I couldn't focus on anything for more than 15 seconds. Now, I am up to 60 seconds at a time."

Several factors make this focus so difficult to achieve. The first is that the scale of this disaster is unprecedented in recent American history. How do you rebuild a community from scratch when its leaders are located from 80 to 350 miles away and you are still looking for its members?

As well, the cloud of uncertainty is all-enveloping, and the Jewish community is not the master of its own fate. Though much of the community's infrastructure seems to have fared relatively well, the decision to reopen those buildings will be based on when basic services will be restored and when the government will allow people to return.

What makes this task immeasurably more difficult is that the community leaders are themselves victims.

"How can I help Tulane [University] students cope with their displacement when my family has been displaced as well, when my kids have been ripped from their lives, too, and I need to help them adjust to a new home and a new school?" asked Paige Nathan, executive director of Hillel of New Orleans.

"What I have been telling my four staff members over and over again is that they have to take care of their own needs first."

Added Jody Portnoff, Hillel's program director, "The students need me to build them up, to help them go forward with their lives. But I don't know if I have it in me to build them up when I need that support as well.

> 'How can I help students cope with their displacement when my family has been displaced as well'

"And it is difficult for us in the helping professions, who are so used to giving help, to ask for and receive help."

Last week, after receiving tetanus and Hepatitis A and B inoculations, Stillman, Bronstone and Mark Rubenstein, executive director of the country's third oldest synagogue, New Orleans' Touro Synagogue, flew into the flooded city, accompanied by the Baton Rouge sheriff's staff, to assess the damage.

Synagogues in the city's Uptown district and the Uptown Jewish Community Center campus suffered minimal damage. Synagogues in Metairie and the new Jewish community campus there, which houses the Metairie Jewish Community Center, the New Orleans Jewish Day School and the Jewish federation offices, took in some water, and flooring and drywall will have to be replaced.

Unfortunately, Beth Israel, the only synagogue located in the Lakeview area near the levee breach, may have to be razed.

"We have unconfirmed information that because of the extensive flooding in that area that all the homes and buildings in that area will be razed completely. There was a large concentration of Jewish families in that area that will now be left homeless," Stillman said.

Baton Rouge, located 80 miles up the Mississippi River from New Orleans, is quickly becoming the new nerve centre of the area's Jewish community. Jewish Family Service, Jewish Endowment Foundation and the New Orleans Jewish Federation are in the process of setting up offices there, with assistance from United Jewish Communities and the local Jewish federation.

About 1,000 people out of an estimated New Orleans Jewish community of 10,000 are now living in the Louisiana capital, which has its own Jewish community of approximately 1,500. Some speculate that many New Orleans Jews will move to Baton Rouge permanently.

The only sure thing is that the face of New Orleans' Jewish agencies will change.

Gerber, of Jewish Family Services, explained, "Our clients will be different, our staff will no doubt be different as several may choose to relocate, and our services will be different.

"While we have always offered financial assistance, it has been for the very poorest of the poor Jews, for whom $500 to $1,000 makes a big difference. Now, we will need to get the middle class up and running, and those needs will be larger. We anticipate putting together packages of loans and grants for them, just like people put together for college.

"Before Katrina, we were already treating a six-year-old boy in counselling who had weather-phobia. Can you imagine how he is faring, and how many more children and adults will need such help? How will schoolchildren, who lost their faith in government because of how it responded to the storm victims, react when they have to recite the Pledge of Allegiance every morning?

"Pre-Katrina, we had a very comprehensive teen suicide prevention program that reached more than 7,000 high school students each year. Next year, when the need will be stronger than ever, where will its funding come from? That is what keeps me up at night."

Hillel of New Orleans is connecting with the 2,000 Jewish students enrolled at Tulane University, albeit "virtually" for the most part, and from Baltimore, not from its building just off campus.

Nathan, Hillel's executive director, is currently living in Baltimore with family members, and Portnoff, Hillel's program director, will be relocating there temporarily as well.

As Nathan said with a rueful smile, "This is not the job we signed up for, but it is the job we need to do."

The first priority is to identify where students are now enrolled and to encourage Hillels on those campuses to reach out to them. One positive factor is that many Jewish students who had never before been involved in Tulane's Hillel have contacted Nathan, and she is adding them to her database.

In the coming weeks, Hillel staff members plan to go down the list and call as many students as possible, to offer support and match them with resources at the school they are attending.

In collaboration with Hillel International and relief agencies on the ground, Portnoff will be planning alternative winter and spring breaks for students from across the country to perform community service in devastated Gulf Coast communities.

Baton Rouge rabbi on paid leave

By LISA HOSTEIN
JTA

NEW YORK — A Baton Rouge, La., synagogue has closed its shelter for victims of Hurricane Katrina and placed its rabbi on administrative leave.

The board of Congregation B'nai Israel asked Rabbi Barry Weinstein to take a paid leave of absence earlier this month for an unspecified period.

Weinstein had led B'nai Israel's effort to house dozens of evacuees who fled their devastated Gulf Coast homes in the wake of Katrina. The synagogue shelter, in turn, received an outpouring of donations and supplies from Jewish communities and individuals around the country that had heard of the congregation's efforts.

The degree to which the shelter's closing and the rabbi's leave are linked is a matter of disagreement. But the developments suggest another unexpected fallout from a natural disaster that has disrupted so many lives. The turmoil has divided and confused a small congregation that for nearly two weeks had come together to help displaced victims.

"This has been very painful for everyone," said Victor Sachse, the president of B'nai Israel, a 230-family Reform congregation that traces its roots to 1858.

Synagogue officials say the decision to ask Rabbi Weinstein to take a leave was related to a personal matter and was not directly connected to the shelter issue.

But some of the rabbi's supporters charge that a few influential members of the community who opposed using the synagogue as a shelter had pressured temple officers to act.

The supporters expressed dismay that the shelter has been closed and Weinstein has been barred from the synagogue.

The last of an estimated 100 evacuees who had found refuge at B'nai Israel left the premises Sept. 11, Sachse said.

He said the synagogue would serve as a base of operations for medical personnel who have come to the area for relief efforts. He also said it would continue facilitating relocation efforts for victims from other shelters and would help fund transportation costs for people needing bus and plane tickets.

Within the B'nai Israel community, there are differing opinions on whether it was the shelter itself or the way it was handled that led to its sudden closing and the rabbi's paid leave.

The shelter was created on Aug. 31 as New Orleans was being submerged under water and beleaguered residents were fleeing their homes in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. While walking his dogs in Baton Rouge, Rabbi Weinstein came across a family of evacuees at a nearby gas station. After consulting with Sachse, who got the approval of the synagogue board, the rabbi brought the family to B'nai Israel and a makeshift shelter was created.

Rabbi Weinstein and volunteers provided bedding, food and counselling. During the next several days, they arranged for several families to find new homes as far away as Miami and San Diego.

Recognized in the community as a leader in interfaith and humanitarian efforts, Rabbi Weinstein, 63, used his contacts to arrange transportation, reunite families and bring in relief supplies.

Sachse said the initial plan had been to provide housing for a few days. He said the synagogue was not equipped to be a shelter – people staying there had to shower across the street at a Catholic school – and the focus was on helping victims resettle elsewhere.

But with the shelter garnering national headlines and Rabbi Weinstein and volunteers reaching out to the community, more evacuees continued to arrive – as did donations of money, food and clothing from mostly Jewish institutions around the country.

As the effort intensified, cracks within the synagogue community appeared, according to several people involved.

With few exceptions, the community initially supported the shelter, which housed mostly poor black families, Sachse said. A few Jewish families also found refuge there.

But within days, Sachse said, "we were overwhelmed."

Rabbi Weinstein "desperately wanted to help everyone we could," Sachse noted, but "his reach exceeded our capabilities."

Some of those active in the shelter effort said bigotry may have played a role in the opposition. They cited instances in which a few synagogue members said it was inappropriate for the evacuees to participate in Friday night services. There was also some opposition to tents being set up on the synagogue lawn to house the overflow of evacuees seeking shelter.

But Sachse rejected the bigotry charge. "There were a few congregants who would have preferred not to shelter people" for reasons such as liability, "but it was never a racial issue," he said.

The conflict came to a head about two weeks ago when, according to several accounts, the rabbi lost his temper with a past president of the congregation.

Rabbi Weinstein, who declined to speak about the turn of events, has been in counselling for several years, according to sources close to him. By all accounts, at the time of his confrontation with the former synagogue official, he had gone nearly a week without sleep and was under tremendous stress.

On Sept. 6, Sachse convened an emergency meeting of the board, which voted unanimously to ask Rabbi Weinstein to take a paid leave, several officers said. Sachse said no pressure had been brought to bear on the board.

The next day, Rabbi Weinstein was asked to leave the premises and his key to the synagogue was taken away.

Sachse said board members were acting "in the interest of both the synagogue and the rabbi."

A Sept. 7 letter to congregants, stating, "the board of trustees has accepted Rabbi Weinstein's decision to take a voluntary leave of absence," angered some synagogue members.

"Yes, he was overtired and needed rest," said Cindie Lang, a congregant who serves as a cantorial soloist, teacher and bar/bat mitzvah tutor at B'nai Israel.

"But if a member of your community is hurting, you support him, you encourage him. He shouldn't be ostracized and locked out," she said.

The question remains: Would Rabbi Weinstein have been placed on leave if he hadn't set up a shelter at the synagogue?

"The only linkage between what we did and the sheltering was the hurricane and the way he reacted to it, not the sheltering itself," Sachse said, suggesting that the concerns about the rabbi predated the shelter.

But others say it's hard to escape linking the rabbi's dismissal to the shelter issue.

Sources close to Rabbi Weinstein say that after serving the congregation for 23 years, he's distraught over what has happened.

B'nai Israel's leadership is now trying to look to the future but no one knows how Rabbi Weinstein's situation will play itself out.

"He's still under contract" for three more years, Sachse said. Whether he's out just temporarily or for good "depends on the rabbi."

Israeli hurricane aid offer rebuffed

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — The United States turned down offers of expert assistance from Israel and other nations in the crucial first days after Hurricane Katrina devastated New Orleans, JTA has learned.

Instead, the United States solicited material assistance from Israel that was probably superfluous by the time the shipment arrived on the evening of Sept. 8.

The reasons behind the decisions are unclear. Experts have offered a number of explanations, including the bureaucratic difficulties involved in absorbing thousands of foreign first-responder personnel; the belief that the existing first-responder infrastructure in Louisiana and Mississippi was well equipped to handle the crisis; and the potential political fallout from asking foreign nations to help the world's greatest power save lives on its own turf.

Such a request would have been "a tremendous admission of failure," said one official of a nongovernmental organization involved in current rescue efforts, who asked not to be identified because of his relationship with U.S. government officials.

The death toll from the storm and subsequent flooding could run anywhere from hundreds of people to tens of thousands. In addition, hundreds of thousands have been rendered homeless.

Critics have excoriated federal, state and local officials for their alleged failure to attend quickly to a disaster that left tens of thousands of people stranded, exposed to disease and at risk of drowning for days.

Democrats and some Republicans, as well as a welter of newspaper editorials, have especially targeted President George W. Bush and his administration for what Democrats contend was a slow and at times remote response to the crisis.

Israel would have been uniquely placed to help, since a cadre of medical experts originally trained to attend to terrorist attacks has honed its expertise at earthquake and hurricane zones across the world. Most recently, Israel rushed medical personnel to Sri Lanka within hours of the tsunami in late December.

In 1998, Israel's lightning response to Al Qaeda attacks on U.S. embassies in east Africa – hours ahead of the arrival of U.S. rescuers – was credited with saving dozens of lives.

The original Israeli offer after Hurricane Katrina was for "the dispatch of medical teams numbering hundreds of people, considerable medical equipment, medicines and additional necessary equipment," according to a statement from the Israeli prime minister's office.

But the Bush administration turned down that and other offers of first-responder and medical-professional help from abroad, JTA has learned.

Officials at the U.S. Federal Emergency Management Agency and the State Department did not return JTA calls seeking comment.

Israel's offer on Sept. 1, a day after the Bush administration declared Katrina's aftermath a public health emergency, came within the four-day window when such assistance is crucial. Israel might have had personnel on the ground by Sept. 2; authorities did not start evacuating the New Orleans Superdome, where most refugees from the hurricane had gathered, until Sept. 3.

Officials involved in co-ordinating assistance did not want to comment on the record, but they said complex U.S. regulations regarding accreditation of doctors and other personnel might have been a factor, in contrast to Israel's experience in developing nations, where such rules are more flexible.

Additionally, no one anticipated that the most advanced medical system in the world would be so easily overwhelmed, experts said.

First-responder assistance from outside the region would have been crucial in the first days after Katrina, said Garry Briese, the executive director of the International Association of Fire Chiefs.

"These communities lost their firefighters. Buildings don't exist, homes don't exist, equipment doesn't exist," he said.

Briese, who has a relationship with Magen David Adom, the Israeli relief agency, dating back to the 1970s when he helped train MDA medics, said Israel would have been uniquely placed to assist. But he wondered if the Israeli experts could have arrived in time, given the travel distance.

There no longer is a need for first-responder assistance, and his organization has called on its members to stop arriving in the region, Briese said.

"We have 150 first responders arriving every day in Baton Rouge," he said.

In the end, the United States asked Israel and other countries to deliver equipment and material. Israel came through on Sept. 8 with 80 tons of food packages, diapers, beds, blankets, generators and other essentials on an El Al flight, partially funded by the Jewish National Fund, that landed in Little Rock, Ark.

"Jewish tradition says, 'To save a life is to save the entire world,' and this comes from the hearts of the Israeli people,"said Eyal Sela, a senior Israeli Foreign Ministry official who accompanied the material.

Speaking to reporters in New York last Friday, Sela left open the possibility that the United States would ask Israel for expert assistance as well. A team of police forensic experts can be dispatched on 36 hours notice, he said, in addition to experts that have aided in other large-scale catastrophes such as the tsunami.

"Until now the request was, 'Send us items,' and we sent it," he said.

President Bush cited Israel's assistance in a Sept. 9 speech thanking countries for their offers of help.

"Israel sent tents and mineral water and medical supplies," Bush said.

But while such assistance is welcome for its symbolic value, it's probably superfluous by now, experts said.

"We're entering a phase where most people have basic access to commodities," said Dean Agee, a vice-president of International Aid, a relief group known for its work in the tsunami zone. "But there is a very large psychological boost to see these countries offering help. Usually it's the United States offering help."

Briese agreed.

"It's more of a good symbol," he said.

Agee foresees the need for more long-term assistance from Israel and other nations in rebuilding the region.

"In Mississippi alone, there are 200,000 roofs needing to be repaired," he said. "I have two photographs in front of me, of Sri Lanka in March and of Gulfport now. In terms of damage, you can't tell the difference."

Community service planned for students

Nathan said that in the coming months, she hopes to travel to campuses where there are sizable numbers of Tulane students in order to help them strengthen not only their Jewish identity but also their Tulane Jewish identity.

The first such meeting was held Sept. 12 at Baltimore's Chizuk Amuno Synagogue with about 35 Baltimore-area Jewish parents whose children attend Tulane, as well as those Tulane students who are studying this semester at Goucher College and Johns Hopkins University.

Janet Kurland and Harriet Schlein of the Jewish Community Critical Incident Response Team, based at Jewish Family Services in Baltimore, offered tips for coping with trauma and stress, and Nathan outlined the initiatives of New Orleans Hillel.

Madeleine Prior, a senior now studying at Johns Hopkins, had spent the spring semester in Europe and was looking forward to returning to Tulane.

"I am grieving for New Orleans, for the people I knew, for Tulane and for myself," she said, "and part of this grieving is that I am really angry, too, at how the government failed to respond to the victims."

Parents of freshmen who were in New Orleans just before the hurricane struck shared their evacuation experiences, while those whose children did not evacuate with them shared their fears and worry.

Yet, all the parents interviewed for this article said they had no qualms about sending their children back to Tulane when the university opens.

In fact, several shared this sentiment, expressed by Lee Meyerhoff Hendler, whose daughter, Josepha, is now spending the first semester of her freshman year at a university in Costa Rica: "Being in a city that is totally rebuilding itself will be a remarkable learning opportunity. If there is any silver lining in this disaster, it is the opportunity for students to become involved with and learn from this rebuilding."

Added Stephen David, father of Julia David, who is studying at Johns Hopkins: "Because of the experiences my daughter's class will have this year, they will have a very different perspective. They will return to Tulane with a real sense of purpose and will know that New Orleans is more than just Bourbon Street and the French Quarter."

Jewish groups save New Orleans Torahs

By MICHAEL C. DUKE

HOUSTON — Jewish groups saved Torahs from the New Orleans area that were in danger because of Hurricane Katrina.

Some 25 scrolls were rescued by a makeshift coalition of representatives from the Jewish Federation of Greater New Orleans, national leadership from the Reform movement, rabbis from Baton Rouge and New Orleans and local law-enforcement officials.

"Among the 25 we saved were also a few that were rescued from the Holocaust, and here they've survived a second horrific disaster," said Rabbi David Saperstein, director of the Reform movement's Washington-based Religious Action Center.

Chabad officials, working with both Jewish and non-Jewish volunteers, rescued at least 15 additional scrolls. "It is a bittersweet occasion," said Rabbi Zelig Rivkin, the executive director of Chabad Lubavitch of Louisiana. "Hurricane Katrina has destroyed our homes, synagogues and our city but has not destroyed our community."

In a dramatic rescue operation, Isaac Leider, of the New York ZAKA Rescue & Recovery Organization, waded through waist-deep toxic floodwaters with six Torah scrolls from Congregation Beth Israel, an Orthodox synagogue in New Orleans. [Photo courtesy ZAKA]

Among the sites that had Torahs rescued were Chabad of Louisiana's Uptown headquarters, the Chabad Jewish Center in Metairie, the Touro Synagogue, Temple Sinai and the federation building, which had housed Torahs belonging to Shir Chadash Conservative Congregation and the New Orleans Jewish Day School.

Rabbi Saperstein noted that the rescued Torahs were sent to cities such as Houston, Baton Rouge and Memphis to be with their respective displaced congregations.

Among the scrolls that remain in New Orleans are Torahs from Congregation Gates of Prayer, which, according to Rabbi Robert Loewy, were taken to a high-rise office building downtown before the evacuation.

Israeli rabbi chastised for comment

NEW YORK — The Conservative movement has chastised a leading Israeli rabbi for saying Hurricane Katrina was divine punishment for Israel's Gaza Strip withdrawal.

Rabbi Jerome Epstein, executive vice president and CEO of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, wrote to Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, spiritual head of the Shas Party and a former Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel, that he was astounded by his commentary.

"God gave the Torah to humanity with the hope that we would live by it and interpret it intelligently," Rabbi Epstein said. "For you to speak with such certainty about what God wants is arrogance. To attempt to convince others of the truth of your interpretation is irresponsible."

In his weekly on sermon Sept. 7, Rabbi Yosef claimed that Katrina "was God's retribution" for U.S. pressure on Israel to withdraw from Gaza. Noting that many of the hurricane's victims were African-American, he also suggested they were punished for being irreligious.

The Reform movement and several American Jewish groups have also criticized Rabbi Yosef's comments.

High Court rules fence can be built beyond Green Line

By YUVAL YOAZ
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The High Court of Justice last Thursday rejected a July 2004 decision by the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in The Hague and ruled that, for security reasons, Israel has the authority in principle to build a separation fence in the West Bank, beyond the 1967 Green Line border.

The panel nevertheless unanimously upheld a petition submitted by Palestinian residents of several West Bank villages and ruled that the state must reconsider, within a reasonable time frame, an alternative route for the separation fence in the area of the northern West Bank settlement of Alfei Menashe.

The petition was submitted by residents of five Palestinian villages in an area known as the Alfei Menashe enclave. The fence separates them from the rest of the West Bank and nearby urban areas – Qalqilyah to the north and Habla to the south – where the residents have received most of their services until now.

The nine-justice panel, headed by Supreme Court President Aharon Barak, instructed the state to review the route of the fence, including areas where it has already been built or is under construction, and adapt it to principles that combine security needs with Palestinian human rights. The Israel Defence Forces must come up with new solutions that would not adversely affect the quality of life of Palestinian residents as severely as the current route does, the justices ruled.

The panel ruled that according to international law, an army in occupied territory is authorized to build a fence to protect the lives of its own citizens, including settlers. The High Court based its ruling on regulations of the ICJ in The Hague, which constitute an integral part of international law, as well as on the constitutional rights of settlers under Israeli law.

This decision rejects the petitioners' stance that Israel does not have the authority to build the fence beyond the Green Line and that the fence is being built for political reasons rather than for security.

The justices ruled that the ICJ's decision should be given legal weight, but that since the judges at The Hague were not presented with the complete evidential basis for Israel's security needs, the ICJ ruling does not bind the Israeli High Court of Justice.

The ruling was formulated by Barak with the consent of all the justices on the panel. Justice Edmond Levy agreed, however, only with the outcome of the ruling, not with its reasoning.

Justice Mishael Cheshin, who also agreed with the High Court's ruling, criticized the ICJ's ruling as consisting of an "overwhelming quantity of sentimental basis that does not fit a judicial opinion."

Cheshin also lambasted the ICJ's "blatant, almost complete disregard for the security problems and the terror which have struck Israel."

The High Court's ruling is likely to have serious repercussions for the actual construction of the separation fence as well as for Israel's foreign policy.

Legal sources have predicted that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon will not be able to avoid addressing the High Court's ruling in public.

Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said the High Court of Justice's ruling on the separation fence route upholds the legality of building the fence beyond the Green Line, despite last year's ruling to the contrary by the ICJ.

"The importance is the court made it legal for a fence beyond the Green Line and decided the world court ruling is not binding," Olmert told Israel Radio.

Attorney Michael Sfard, who represented the Palestinian petitioners, said, "We are talking about a very brave verdict on the part of the High Court, which extracts Israel from the international imbroglio it has entered."

"Specifically, the High Court has saved five Palestinian villages from utter annihilation, because, if the fence had been left in place, they would not have been able to continue to exist."

Sfard added that the ruling will have an impact on the future of other sections of the fence, including in the area surrounding the larger enclaves of Ariel and Kedumim.

State Prosecution representative Anner Helman said in response to the High Court's decision, "The state must uphold the verdict, and reconsider the route of the fence according to the court's ruling."

"We will uphold the verdict that Alfei Menashe can remain connected to Israel, and the fence surrounding it can be connected to the fence on the Green Line," he added.

Pope urged to deplore destruction of Gaza shuls

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ROME — Israel's chief rabbis last week urged Pope Benedict to forcefully deplore the destruction of synagogues in Gaza by Palestinians after the Israeli withdrawal.

The two rabbis, Yona Metzger and Shlomo Amar, held about 45 minutes of private talks with the Pope at his papal summer residence at Castelgandolfo, south of Rome.

"We asked the Pope to talk about it, to deplore it and to issue a strong appeal against it," Rabbi Metzger said at a news conference with Rabbi Amar and other officials at a Rome airport after the meeting.

"We cannot allow synagogues, mosques and churches to be destroyed anywhere," Rabbi Metzger said.

After the pullout, Palestinian crowds, including armed militants, destroyed several synagogues. Palestinian officials, calling the shuls symbols of 38 years of occupation, said Israel should have destroyed them before withdrawing.

The rabbis said they urged the Pope to speak out on the issue on behalf of believers of all faiths around the world.

"We learned from history that terrorism is a cancer. World War II started with the burning of synagogues and then they burned people," Rabbi Metzger said.

"Not only synagogues are holy but so are all places where people find their affinity with their God."

They also urged the Pope to designate one day each year for Catholics around the world to reflect on Catholic-Jewish relations and jointly discuss ways of fighting anti-Semitism.

The rabbis held what they called a "very cordial and heartfelt" meeting with the Pope as part of commemorations marking the 40th anniversary of a landmark Vatican document called Nostra Actate (In Our Times).

That document revolutionized relations with Jews by rejecting the notion of collective Jewish guilt for the death of Christ.

The rabbis said that they and the Pope "felt very comfortable with each other" and that they were certain that his papacy would build on improved Catholic-Jewish relations, a process begun with his predecessor John Paul II, who died last April.

Oded Ben-Hur, Israel's ambassador to the Vatican, said the Pope told the rabbis that he saw their visit as a "further step toward the process of building deeper religious relations between Christians and Jews."

Ben-Hur said the Pope told them that "acts of violence and terror" continued to cause immense sorrow for anyone living in the Holy Land.

The rabbis repeated a standing invitation to the Pope to visit Jerusalem.

Last Thursday's meeting followed Benedict's historic visit to the central synagogue in Cologne, Germany, last month, only the second time a pope had entered a Jewish house of worship. During the visit, Benedict decried that the world is witnessing the rise of new forms of anti-Semitism.

The rabbis' visit also follows a diplomatic tiff between the Vatican and Israel that erupted over the Pope's recent omission of Israel in a list of countries hit by terrorism.

The dispute was resolved after Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon wrote a letter to the Pope, Ben-Hur said.

Ma'aleh Adumim will be linked to Jerusalem: Sharon

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, speaking to U.S. Jewish figures in New York, in remarks broadcast Monday, pledged that the West Bank settlement city of Ma'aleh Adumim will be linked to Jerusalem.

Sharon's remarks came as the outgoing U.S. ambassador to Israel said that U.S. President George W. Bush would back an Israeli government request to keep larger West Bank settlement areas under its control in a permanent peace agreement with the Palestinians.

To applause, Sharon declared, "Ma'aleh Adumim, the most beautiful town in the most beautiful area there – it's really unbelievable – will be connected to Jerusalem."

Outgoing U.S. ambassador to Israel, Daniel Kurtzer

Ma'aleh Adumim, several kilometres from Jerusalem, is one of the blocs in question. The area known as E1, which links the cities, has been the focus of a flurry of reports over Israeli plans to build in the zone.

Palestinians have voiced fears that Israel intends to settle the West Bank in a manner that effectively severs the north half from the south.

Israel has stated that it will build a police station in E1, as well as scores of new housing units. But it has denied reports of plans to build thousands of homes.

In remarks broadcast on Israel Radio, the prime minister turned aside the Palestinian suggestions that Samaria, the northern half of the West Bank, would be cut off from Judea, the southern part.

"I think that we have answers to these issues," Sharon said. "They will be connected, and I don't think that this will become a problem."

According to Sharon, Israel is examining several options for maintaining links between the north and the south. He did not elaborate.

Outgoing U.S. Ambassador Daniel Kurtzer said in an interview broadcast Sunday that Bush would back a request by Israel to retain some West Bank settlement blocs under a permanent peace deal with the Palestinians.

Palestinians reacted with anger to the comments, saying they would only encourage Israel to pre-empt final status negotiations.

Kurtzer, who completed his term last week, cited an April 2004 letter from Bush to Sharon. "The policy is exactly what the president said," Kurtzer said in the prerecorded interview. "In the context of a final status agreement, the United States will support the retention by Israel of areas with a high concentration of Israeli population."

Kurtzer's language went slightly further than the original Bush letter, which did not speak of Israel retaining territory it captured in the 1967 Six Day War, but said only that a return to the prewar borders of 1949 was unlikely.

"In light of new realities on the ground, including already existing major Israeli populations centres, it is unrealistic to expect that the outcome of final status negotiations will be a full and complete return to the armistice lines of 1949," Bush wrote in the letter handed to Sharon during a visit to Washington on April 14 last year.

A senior Palestinian official, Saeb Erekat, said that the United States should remain unbiased in matters related to the final peace agreement between the sides.

"I believe this pre-empts and prejudges issues that are reserved for final status negotiations," Erekat said. "Any talk of pre-empting and prejudging is counterproductive to the peace process."

Kurtzer is to be succeeded by Richard H. Jones.

Total Canadian assistance to the PA $36.7M

Gaza, and to ensure that Palestinians feel immediate benefits from Israel's withdrawal.

This will require democracy, the rule of law, strong public administration and good governance, the prime minister said.

"All this will not come easily, but it will come, with the aid of Canada and the international community and the hard work of the Palestinian leadership and people," he said. "Support for the institution-building and reform efforts of [PA] President [Mahmoud] Abbas is key. Canada and the international community expect the PA to do its utmost to ensure law and order and good governance."

When Abbas visited Ottawa in May, the government announced $12.2 million in new Canadian assistance to the Palestinians.

"Our announcement in May was a first step. Canada has prepared further measures of support in three sectors: security and safety, governance, and economic development and private sector – and we will do more," Martin said.

The new money brings the total amount of new Canadian assistance to the Palestinians to $36.7 million. Since 1993, Canada has provided more than $310 million in assistance to Palestinians throughout the Middle East, Martin said.

On Monday, the European Union also announced details of 60 million euros worth of new aid for the Palestinians, raising the 2005 EU total to 280 million euros. The move came a day before talks were to take place in New York between the four parties that are sponsoring the Mideast peace process.

If assistance from the EU's 25 individual member governments is added, Europe's total 2005 aid to the Palestinians has reached about 500 million euros.

"Only Israel and Palestine can make peace, but Europe is playing its part in the international 'quartet' to create the environment in which peace can take root," EU Foreign Affairs Commissioner Benita Ferrero-Waldner said in a statement.

Foreign ministers of the so-called "quartet" – the United States, Russia, the EU and the United Nations – were to meet Tuesday to discuss the way forward in the Middle East after Israel's evacuation of Gaza.

One key issue is the future of the Gaza-Egypt border. Israel closed the border's Rafah crossing when it withdrew its forces from Gaza last week. The Palestinians want Rafah to reopen quickly, possibly with European monitors.

The new EU aid package for the Palestinians, includes money to help upgrade Gaza's airport, develop its seaport and build housing now that Jewish settlers have been removed from the area.

Of the 60 million euros in new aid, 40 million goes to transport, water supply and sanitation projects in the Gaza Strip, 12 million to boost political and government institutions and 8 million for social services in east Jerusalem, EU officials said.

In the EU's view, last month's evacuation of Israeli settlers and troops from Gaza, as well as the dismantling of its 21 settlements, has put into greater focus the need to make the area more economically and politically viable.

This touches on economic opportunities, the ability of Palestinians to move freely between Gaza and the West Bank, and secure borders and entry points.

"Our substantial assistance package will make an important contribution to achieving" these objectives, Ferrer-Waldner said. "Having led the way in support for reform efforts in the Palestinian Authority, we are now helping to lay the foundations for a viable Palestinian economy."

She said the EU was ready to start construction of a 25-million-euro cargo terminal at the Gaza airport, and several EU states have offered to help develop the seaport.

In addition to the 60 million euros, the EU has also set aside 70 million euros for this year if the Palestinian Authority implements political and economic reforms; 10 million euros for projects bringing Palestinian and Israeli non-governmental organizations together; 29 million euros in food aid; 28 million euros in humanitarian aid and 64 million euros for the UN Works and Refugee Agency.

Musharraf makes historic appearance

By CHANAN TIGAY
JTA

NEW YORK — It was a remarkable sight: the president of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan sitting on a New York dais alongside leaders of the American Jewish community and Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, eating a kosher dinner beneath a blue and white banner reading "Council for World Jewry."

It was all the more notable considering the personal risk the appearance could entail for Pervez Musharraf, who has been the subject of several recent assassination attempts at the hands of Muslim extremists who are violently anti-Israel and anti-America.

Pervez Musharraf

And indeed, there was near-unanimous agreement among Jews and Pakistanis at last Saturday night's event that Musharraf's mere presence before an audience of Jewish officials represented a potentially historic step in Muslim-Jewish relations.

For his landmark gesture, the Pakistani general received a series of standing ovations.

"I would never have imagined that a Muslim, a president of Pakistan, and, more than that, a man in uniform would ever get such a warm reception from the Jewish community," Musharraf said as he ascended the platform.

But Musharraf's half-hour speech on Saturday night met with disappointment from some Jewish leaders who found his remarks rich in hyperbole but lacking in specific proposals.

"If we waited 100 years" to hold this meeting, "it would have been even more historic, but what is it we have achieved?" asked Abraham Foxman, the national director of the Anti-Defamation League. "In his world, in his culture, in his environment, this is a major step. From our perspective, it isn't."

Others felt the critical comments were unrealistic. "It is not helpful for us to be critical of a Muslim leader who, given his political pressures, comes to speak to us and doesn't give us everything we want at that moment in time," said Jack Rosen, the chair of the American Jewish Congress – whose Council for World Jewry sponsored the event.

"We couldn't have expected that he would have announced last night that he would immediately begin normalizing relations with Israel," Rosen told JTA on Sunday

Musharraf's address followed closely on the heels of his brief encounter last week with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on the sidelines of the United Nations World Summit and a recent meeting between the foreign ministers of the two countries, which do not have full diplomatic ties.

Challenged by Foxman to show more leadership by moving to formalize Israeli-Pakistani relations right away, Musharraf responded that "57 years of hatred, bitterness, animosity cannot be undone so fast.

"It is my sincere judgment that this is not the time to do it," he said. "We need to be very patient. I need some more reasons and rationale. I need some more support" to be able to convince the Pakistani people to go along with the move.

Musharraf spoke about religious similarities between Muslims and Jews and characterized recent hostility between the two groups as an aberration against a background of historical coexistence. He further earned plaudits for insisting that terrorism "cannot be condoned for any cause."

While he referred to "Schindler's list" and praised Sharon for the recent Gaza Strip withdrawal, Musharraf upset many in the audience by insisting that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is a root cause of world terrorism and that Pakistan will not forge diplomatic ties with Israel until the Palestinians have a state.

"Palestine has been at the heart of troubles in the Middle East," he said. "I have no doubt whatsoever that any attempt to shy away from or ignore the root causes of terrorism is shutting one's eyes to reality and is a sure recipe for failure."

That sentiment struck a raw nerve among many of his listeners, who lamented that Muslim nations for too long have tried to lay the blame for many of the world's ills on Israel.

Musharraf also called on Israel to withdraw from the West Bank and respect other faiths' attachment to Jerusalem. He did not express any corresponding demands for the Palestinian side.

"Israel must come to terms with geopolitical reality and let justice prevail for the Palestinians," Musharraf said. "They want their own independent state, and they must get it."

Since the terror attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Pakistan has had something of an image problem in the West.

Daniel Pearl, a Jewish reporter for the Wall Street Journal, was kidnapped and decapitated by terrorists in Pakistan; Osama bin Laden is thought to be in hiding somewhere along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border; a Pakistani nuclear scientist was discovered to have supplied nuclear technology to Iran, Libya and North Korea; and Pakistan's extensive network of religious schools has been accused of spreading a radically violent and anti-western version of Islam.

Many in the audience saw Musharraf's decision to address a Jewish audience as a public relations move rather than the reflection of a serious desire for detente.

Like many in the Muslim world, Musharraf views the American Jewish community as the key to securing political influence in Washington, some said.

Musharraf did not do much to dispel this impression.

"I feel privileged to be speaking to so many members of what is probably the most distinguished and influential community in the United States," he said.

But Mossadaq Chughtai, the director of the Pakistani American Liaison Center, which runs the Congressional Pakistan Caucus, dismissed this line of thinking.

"We have good standing with Congress" and the White House, he said, noting that President George W. Bush has hosted Musharraf at Camp David.

Gaza-Egypt border closed

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The Gaza-Egypt border will only reopen as part of an international agreement, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said Monday, quashing speculation that Egypt and the Palestinians might operate a crossing there without Israel's blessing.

Abbas spoke a day after his security forces plugged the last holes in the border fortifications, ending a week of chaos during which thousands of Gazans and Egyptians flooded across the frontier without controls. "The [border] terminal will be open when there is an international agreement," Abbas said.

"We want to do the right job at the right time because we want to act as a state, as a responsible authority," Abbas said. "Therefore we are following up on the subject seriously with our brothers in Egypt. Until we reach agreement, we should be patient."

In a possible departure from longstanding policy, Israel is weighing the option of a European Union security role at the Rafah crossing on the Egypt-Gaza border, the British Independent newspaper reported on Monday.

Israel has traditionally rejected the involvement of third-parties – Europeans in particular – in active police roles at border crossings.

But the newspaper's online edition quoted unnamed sources in Jerusalem as confirming that the option of an EU role was under discussion.

Israel had long viewed European nations as pro-Palestinian in orientation. That view has changed in recent years, with EU co-sponsorship of the "road map" peace plan and European expressions of understanding for Israel's battle with terrorism providing a measure of common ground.

Possible EU roles could range from providing X-ray scanners for cargo to an armed police or border-guard detachment, the paper said.

Qatar-Israel relations?

Qatar said it's considering establishing full diplomatic relations with Israel. The establishment of a Palestinian state would not be a condition of the upgrade in relations, Qatar's foreign minister, Sheik Hamad bin Jassim bin Jabor Al-Thani, told Israeli Foreign Minster Silvan Shalom at a meeting last week at the United Nations, a spokesperson for Shalom told JTA. "It's great news," Shalom's spokesperson said. "We were very delighted to hear it."

Sharon, Musharraf talk

Ariel Sharon met Pakistan's president at the United Nations. Pervez Musharraf shook hands with and introduced his wife to the Israeli prime minister at a reception for leaders attending the United Nations World Summit. Musharraf earlier had declined an Israeli invitation to hold formal talks with Sharon at the event. The Israeli and Pakistani foreign ministers met earlier this month in Istanbul, signalling a thaw in ties, and Musharraf was scheduled to address American Jewish groups in New York. But Pakistan has said it will only normalize relations with Israel after the creation of a Palestinian state.

Bush rejects plea for Pollard

U.S. President George W. Bush has rejected Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's request that he pardon convicted spy Jonathan Pollard. Sharon asked Bush for Pollard's release at the UN World Summit. Pollard has served 20 years in jail for spying for Israel. "If you want to help me," Sharon said to Bush, "his [Pollard's] release will help me more than anything else." Bush responded that he has considered all sorts of ideas for how to help Sharon following the disengagement, but that particular idea never entered his head. He also noted that Sharon has raised the issue of Pollard at every one of their meetings, and said he has considered it each time, but his position has not changed.

Abbas offers olive branch

Mahmoud Abbas called for renewed Israeli-Palestinian peace talks following Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip. "We stretch our hand to Israel with an offer of true peace," the Palestinian Authority president said in his first broadcast address since Israeli troops completed a pullout from Gaza this week. "I call on the government of Israel to exploit this historic opportunity, to make good on its commitments, to stop the construction of the West Bank barrier and settlements, to release prisoners and allow exiles to return." Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has characterized the Gaza pullout as an opportunity for renewed negotiations, but on the condition that the PA fulfils its commitments under the "road map" peace plan to dismantle terrorist groups. Abbas has ruled this out, but he hinted in his speech that he would try to make Hamas and Islamic Jihad follow the official PA policy of seeking coexistence with the Jewish state. "There is no room for this or that faction's private agenda," he said.

Fertility breakthrough?

Israeli scientists successfully reimplanted sheep ovaries that had been frozen, a potential breakthrough in fertility treatment. Researchers at the Institute of Animal Science at Beit Dagan said that they had restored functions to sheep ovaries that had been temporarily removed and put on ice, producing two lambs. If adapted to humans, the procedure could be a boon to women rendered infertile by illness, and who choose to harvest and freeze their ovaries. The institute said adapting the procedure for human application required years of further research.

Mideast tourist drive

Israel teamed up with the Palestinian Authority, Egypt and Jordan to encourage regional tourism. The tourism ministers of the four peoples met in southern Egypt to formulate a three-week package tour of Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Petra, in Jordan, and the pyramids. They also resolved to lobby the United States to scale back its advisories against Middle East travel in light of changing political circumstances in the region. — JTA

Forbidden love set in Morocco blooms in Marock

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Laila Marrakchi's Marock breaks new ground.

Screened at the Toronto International Film Festival, her movie delves into a topic rarely seen in contemporary cinema.

Marock, set in Morocco in 1997, turns on the theme of forbidden love, a hot subject in any language or culture. But here the lovers are a Jew and an Arab. What could be more interesting in this age of radical Islam and the festering Arab-Israeli conflict?

The protagonists in this intriguing film are the secular and self-absorbed rich and idle youth of Casablanca who live in gated mansions with servants and fritter away their days in a haze of parties, marijuana, music, sex and fast cars.

As the film opens, to a pulsing disco musical score and the roar of late-model American and European cars vying for scarce parking spaces near a fancy club, a young couple in an automobile embrace and kiss in a moment of passion.

Nearby, in a telling juxtaposition of modern-day Morocco, an elderly Muslim man bows and prays.

As they kiss, the couple is brusquely interrupted by a police officer who asks for their papers.

The scene shifts to the rooftop garden of a sprawling house facing the shimmering sea. Rita (Morjana Alaoui), the spoiled 17-year-old daughter of a wealthy Arab businessman, takes a call from a friend who wants to introduce her to Youri (Matthieu Boujenah), a local heartthrob.

"The guy's Jewish," Rita's girlfriend notes. But Rita, having spied Youri at a party, is smitten. She has a crush on Youri and desperately wants to meet him. Who cares if he's Jewish.

Although Ramadan has already fallen, she desecrates the holiday by nibbling on pastry the cook has just baked. She playfully calls Rita a heathen.

The plot thickens when Rita's brother, Mao (Assaad Bouab), returns from an extended stay in London. Mao, a handsome guy, is embracing Islam and Rita can't understand his mindset.

Matthieu Boujenah, right, and Assaad Bouab in Marock.

"Are you nuts?" she asks in exasperation. Mao, upset by her heavy makeup, hits back. "You look like a whore," he says.

Rita's budding romance with Youri does not go unnoticed. "He's a Jew," her father's chauffeur fumes. "So what," she counters, breaking with tradition.

Marock makes the point, time and time again, that Jews and Arabs inhabit different worlds, that stereotypes usually define their relationships and that inter-religious liaisons are off limits.

Rita's Muslim friend advises her, in all solemnity, that Jewish boys covet Arab girls, while Youri's Jewish pal warns him that his parents will be none too pleased if he brings Rita home.

As their romance develops, Youri confides in Rita. He tells her that his parents want him to immigrate to the United States, and that they have felt uneasy as Jews in Morocco since the 1991 Gulf War.

The chasm between Jews and Arabs comes out in other ways as well.

When Rita's father finds out she is dating Youri, he forbids her to see him again.

Youri's best friend, a Jew, also offers unsolicited advice. "Arabs aren't for us," he says, referring to Rita.

Though Rita is open-minded, Youri's Jewish background is an underlying source of concern to her. Sensing that she is staring at his Star of David necklace, he removes it as they make out.

Later, she urges him to convert to Islam. When he, in turn, asks Rita to convert to Judaism, she says her parents would be ashamed if she became a Jew.

Marrakchi, who wrote and directed the film, deals deftly with all these undercurrents of tension, and as a result, Marock is plausible and, one might add, quite entertaining.

The cast delivers the goods, but Morjana Alaoui stands out from the rest as a rising star, a Moroccan Reese Witherspoon.

Art imitates life for film director Laila Marrakchi

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"It's a very personal film," said Laila Marrakchi, referring to her first feature-length movie, Marock.

In what is surely a remarkable case of art imitating life, her film turns on a romance between a Jew and a Muslim in contemporary Morocco, a theme very close to her heart.

Marock, which was screened at the 30th annual Toronto International Film Festival, stars Morjana Alaoui and Matthieu Boujenah as young lovers who defy convention in a conservative society.

Alaoui portrays Rita, a 17-year-old sex kitten from a wealthy Muslim family, while Boujenah plays Youri, a Jew who happens to be the cutest guy in Casablanca, where Marock is set.

The pair share tender moments, knowing that their liaison raises eyebrows in both communities.

Like Rita, Marrakchi is a Moroccan Muslim from Casablanca – the commercial and cultural capital of Morocco – and the scion of a well-to-do family.

The similarities do not end there.

In Casablanca, Marrakchi had Jewish friends and her girlfriend dated a Jewish boy. And now she is married to a Sephardi Jew whose father was born in Algeria.

Marrakchi, 29, described Marock as a blend of fact and fiction. "It's not my life in the film," she said in French-accented English, "but it's personal."

Charming and attractive, she talked about herself in an interview several hours before she and Alaoui, 23, were due to fly back to Paris, where they live part of the year.

Marrakchi comes from a traditional but secular home. Her father owned a car dealership. She left the comforts of Morocco a decade ago to study cinema in France.

Before making Marock, a French production that cost about two million Euros, she directed three short films.

Like the characters in her latest film, the actors are Muslims and Jews.

Boujenah is a Jew of Tunisian origin, while Alaoui is a Muslim. The daughter of an architect, she is presently finishing a degree in journalism, but she may yet pursue a career in acting if opportunities present themselves.

Marrakchi, in Toronto for the first time, said her circle of friends in Casablanca mixed easily with Jews.

"The Jews of Morocco are Moroccans. There is no difference."

In her estimation, 2,000 to 3,000 Jews currently live in Morocco, down from about 25,000 a generation ago.

She believes members of the Jewish community will remain in Morocco. "They like Morocco. It's their country."

Jews are not the only ones who fear the rising tide of Islamic radicalism in the Arab world, she said.

Her cousin was sitting in a restaurant in Casablanca a few years ago when suicide bombers affiliated with Al Qaeda struck. Fortunately, she emerged unscathed.

"Fundamentalism in Morocco is a danger, yes, but we can control it. Morocco is different than Iran."

As for Muslim radicalism in France, Marrakchi said the government is dealing with it.

Marock, which is supposed to be released in theatres in France early next year, has already been screened in Morocco and at the Cannes Film Festival.

"The reaction was good," Marrakchi said.

She hopes to sell the film to a distributor in Israel, where many Moroccan Jews live and which she has never visited.

She is currently working on another film that will also be shot in Morocco.

There is no place like home.

ISRAELI CONSULATE HONOURS GITAI'S FILM FREE ZONE

The Israeli Consulate hosted a breakfast at the Windsor Arms Hotel last week to celebrate the inclusion of Israeli director Amos Gitai's film Free Zone in this year's Toronto International Film Festival. Starring Natalie Portman, it was the only Israeli film included this year.

Natalie Portman in Amos Gitai's Free Zone.

Although neither Gitai nor Portman was in attendance at the breakfast (neither had been expected), Eye On Arts chatted with Lia van Leer, founding director of the 21-year-old Jerusalem International Film Festival. Van Leer is a habituee of other fests in Lucarno, Venice, New York, London, Rotterdam, Berlin and Cannes, and has been attending the Toronto festival for two decades.

Unreeling each July, the Jerusalem International Film Festival (JIFF) features some 200 films of all kinds, not just those with Jewish themes, she told us. It is probably the world's foremost showcase for new Israeli cinema, but also screens a wide variety of other material, including documentaries, American independents, short films and archival classics and restorations.

As a project of the Jerusalem Cinematheque, JIFF is also attached to the Israel Film Archives. "It's a very big archives that has international films and all the Israeli films," van Leer said. "It has copies of all the Jewish films that have been made in the world since the beginning of the last century. We have something like 40,000 films now."

For details, see the festival website, www.jff@org.il.

Israeli show goes on

DUBLIN — The director of Dublin's Fringe Festival rejected calls to cancel an Israeli play. In response to a letter from the Ireland Palestine Solidarity Campaign demanding the cancellation of The Timekeepers, a play by a Tel Aviv theatre group exploring the relationship between a Jewish man and a German homosexual in the Sachsenhausen concentration camp, Wolfgang Hoffmann insisted he would not "be bullied into not working with artists that I respect."

The Solidarity Campaign, which supports a cultural boycott of Israel, organized a protest for the play's opening night, but fewer than 10 people showed up, while the play attracted a near-full house. Festival organizers brought the play to Ireland with financial help from the Israeli Embassy.

EXCAVATION SPARKS DEBATE: COULD RUINS BE PALACE OF KING DAVID?

Israeli archeologist Eilat Mazor has uncovered what may be the 3,000-year-old foundation walls of the palace of the biblical King David in the City of David, an area adjacent to the Old City of Jerusalem.

The foundations of the monumental building are large boulders and its walls are more than six feet thick and extend at least 98 feet. Also found at the site were a governmental seal of an official named Jehucal or Jucal, who is mentioned in the Book of Jeremiah, and numerous shards of Iron Age II pottery dating from the 10th to 9th centuries, corresponding to the time of David and Solomon.

The find has sparked a lively debate among archeologists about whether the structure is actually the palace of the fabled Jewish king, asleep in the dust for three millennia. If true, it "could turn out to be the archeological find of the century," according to the Jerusalem Post. But in any case, all agree that it is a rare and important major public building from a period that has been under-represented in the archeological record.

"This is a very significant discovery, given that Jerusalem as the capital of the united [Jewish] kingdom is very much unknown," said Gabriel Barkay, an archeologist from Israel's Bar-Ilan University. "This is one of the first greetings we have from the Jerusalem of David and Solomon, a period which has played a kind of hide-and-seek with archeologists for the last century."

Just down the hill from that excavation, near the Old City walls, workers repairing a sewage line last summer unearthed what appeared to be two steps. Three short stairways were uncovered, leading down to a pool.

Archeologists using metal detectors found coins in the plaster that helped them date the pool to the Second Temple period between roughly 100 BCE and 70 CE. They hypothesize the structure is the Pool of Siloam associated with Jesus.

As the Holy City yields more of its secrets, it seems to become ever more sacred for many of its residents and visitors.

Filmmaker explores the life of gypsy jazz guitar wizard

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

The old adage, imitation is the greatest form of flattery, rings truest in music. Normally, people paint their faces like Kiss, dress up like Cher, or grow mop tops like The Beatles, but one obscure, deceased jazz artist is bringing out the copycats in droves.

In a new Bravo! documentary Djangomania!,(Sept.25, 8 p.m.) Toronto filmmaker Jamie Kastner explores the life of gypsy jazz guitar wizard Django Reinhardt, and why thousands of followers across the world have suddenly taken to an artist who's been dead for over 50 years.

"It is a bit nuts. This level is something new," says Kastner, a former pop music critic for the Toronto Sun.

When Reinhardt was alive, he was no stranger to fandom. In the 1940s the Belgium born musician played throughout Europe, and was in such high demand the Nazis wanted to take him on tour in Germany. People were drawn to Reinhardt's unique style of gypsy jazz, due in large part to the way he played guitar. When he was 18 he was involved in a caravan fire, which rendered his fourth and fifth fingers useless. He ended up mastering the six string with his three remaining digits.

Despite his original guitar style, his fame wore off near the end of his life and he remained in obscurity for many years after.

"His star had already begun to fade before he died," says Kastner, who sought out Reinhardt fans in Japan, Norway, Britain and the States. "He almost stopped playing by the time he died. He'd fish and play pool and in the years after his death there was no Djangomania."

It was in the '70s, with the advent of the audiocassette that people started rediscovering the guitar hero, but it's only more recently that his popularity exploded.

"Maybe the Internet is part of it," says Kaster. "It seems to be a good forum for obsessives to really play things out in a larger scale, in terms of interest and trading of lore and expensive stuff, including his Selmer guitars which go for up to $20,000."

Jamie Kastner on the set of Djangomania! in Belgium.

Kastner says the fandom's not limited to buying memorabilia. The real obsessive fans dress like Django, act like Django and most importantly, play like Django.

"It's interesting. They're a fairly sophisticated bunch of crazies. It's not obvious fan craziness like the Dead Heads. Django fans seem to be on the surface otherwise normally functioning human beings. It's not a passive kind of fandom, it's an active thing. They're not going to concerts, they're bringing their hero back to life through their playing."

Kastner's own obsession with Django began when he was a "teenage guitar nerd". The nephew of Emmy award winning filmmaker John Kastner says he worshiped the typical guitar gods – Jimi Hendrix, Eric Clapton – but this strange gypsy guitarist wound up in his record collection as well.

"I became aware of this kind of mythical figure called Django, who was a little bit unusual in the teenage guitar nerd cannon. I bought a used record in Montreal on a class trip once and discovered this kind of quaint, obscure and impressive sound. It wasn't until maybe four years ago, I happened into a club where there were these guys in there 20s playing this music, very convincingly. This was the music I'd only ever heard of on scratchy old records."

The musicians he stumbled upon were not only playing Reinhardt's music, but they wore Django's same trademark thin moustache. He couldn't understand why these guitarists were doing something so "un-hip," so he decided to find out. He went to France to check out the Django Reinhardt festival – on the 50th anniversary of his death - and was surprised to see just how crazy people were for Reinhardt.

"What I found in France, was suddenly (Django's) sound was everywhere. You couldn't go anywhere without running into someone playing the eight favorite songs of the Django cult."

After his initially foray into Djangomania, Kastner began having doubts about his convictions. He questioned if following fans of a half-century old guitar player was worth his time.

"There was a point where I thought, do I care about Django that much to go through all of this? Indeed part of that parenthetically made me try to think about the subject, do I care very personally about this?"

After looking deeper into Reinhardt's life, though, Kastner realized that this story was more personal than he initially anticipated.

"I'm raising some issues in the film, some questions that are quite controversial with diehard Django fans. Particularity about him and his success during World War II. He was the most popular jazz musician in occupied France. The Nazis loved him. You've got to wonder, how did he, as a Gypsy survive? There's no hard evidence he was a collaborator, but personally, I wound up feeling that he wasn't something I'd consider a hero."

Kastner's negative reaction to Reinhardt's role in WWII, whatever that may have been, doesn't end there. He found out that the jazz guitarist knew people who had ties to the resistance, but Reinhardt still sat idly by.

"Other people very close to him were resistance members. His manager and his biographer, Charles Delaunay, was either Jewish or half Jewish. He was actively involved in the Jazz end of the French resistance. There are people near Django, other Jews and Gypsies and non-Jews, who were doing undeniably heroic things, and Django was not one of these to say the least. All of that was an extremely engaging journey for me."

After voyaging deep into Django's life and meeting many of his rabid fans, Kastner was finally able to put forth a theory as to why Reinhardt's legacy has lived on, while other eccentric Jazz musicians from that time have only become minor footnotes in musical history.

"He's become a mythical figure. Having people know little about your life story and being safely dead is a big part of it. For instance, Stephen Grappelli, Django's main musical collaborator, lived on and had a rich artistically successful career. He lived until a ripe old age, played the same vein of music, but you don't hear of Stephen Grappelli festivals going on. There's something in Django's music that's quaint, accessible and happy, and it has a groovy mystique about it."

Raising awareness of breast cancer in men

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Menachem Mendel Meir Meister, 58, insists that developing breast cancer was the best thing that ever happened to him.

This admittedly unusual reaction comes from his belief that it was God's message to him that he should reconsider the priorities in his life. Instead of concentrating only on his business, accounting and tax consulting career, he would help patients and their family members recognize how the disease affects everyone involved.

Meister, known as George Meister before he made aliyah two years ago, still comes to stay in Toronto regularly. He is one of the one in 100 men diagnosed with breast cancer – a far lower percentage than in women. Nevertheless, there are definite similarities, especially among Jews, he said. The same gene mutations, BRCA 1 and 2 make Jewish men and women more susceptible to breast, ovarian and prostate cancer.

Still, he said, many people don't even realize that men can get breast cancer – and that, he added, applies to the medical profession as well.

For four years, Meister had bleeding from his left nipple, bleeding that stained his shirt, tzitzit and sheets. A succession of "well respected" general practitioners in both Toronto and Israel told him it was nothing. One told him to simply put a bandage on it.

He felt somewhat comforted, he said, assuming that if anything was wrong, he would be sent for tests.

Last year, having done a great deal of research in books, journals and on the Internet, he felt confident enough to insist that he be tested to see what was wrong. This time, the doctor agreed and sent him to a plastic surgeon whom Meister had dealt with before. A mammogram and ultrasound showed nothing.

It wasn't until he went to a surgeon ("I chose a woman – I thought she would be more empathetic") that he got the diagnosis: ductal carcinoma in situ.

DCIS, as it is referred to, is cancer contained in the ductal cells, usually just behind the nipple.

Although many women today are treated with a lumpectomy, in which just the cancerous part of the breast is removed, Meister's surgeon insisted on doing a mastectomy.

"She said it was better to err on the side of safety. She said that there simply wasn't enough research into breast cancer in males to know how radical the surgery should be," he said.

In May, Meister had his mastectomy. His prognosis now is good, so good that he doesn't need chemotherapy or radiation.

In male breast cancer, he said, the prognosis tends to be worse than for women, mainly because of the lack of awareness in both men and doctors, who tend to "slough off" the symptoms: a lump, pain or sensitivity, or a clear or bloody discharge from the nipple. Because of the late diagnosis, he said, between 25 and 35 per cent of men with breast cancer die.

Meister, who said he has always been a proactive type of person, decided to take up the cause of breast cancer. "I found that women get a lot of information and help from Wellspring, at Sunnybrook, and from Gilda's Club. Also, they get a pre-surgery class, which teaches them what will happen during and after the surgery, and what exercises or anything else they should do at home."

Men, he charged, get none of this. "I decided I would deal with this."

Meister, with a growing number of other men who have the disease, has formed three organizations: the Male Breast Cancer Alliance International, Breast Cancer Coalition International, and Cancer People Power Revolution International.

The "international" part of the names comes from the fact that because of the small numbers involved in each country, the only way to promote greater awareness, more education and trustworthy research is to take a global approach.

"We want to create awareness in the general community – not just men, but the women in their lives, who tend to be more sensitive and more inclined to insist on prompt action," he said.

Meister started his projects in July, and he has already had "phenomenal" response from people in some 50 countries.

In Toronto, he runs support groups once a month at three locations: the Marvelle Koffler Breast Cancer Clinic at Mount Sinai Hospital; Gilda's Club on Lombard Street in downtown Toronto; and Wellspring at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre.

On Oct. 6, for breast cancer month, he will present a play at Gilda's Club about male breast cancer. Called ASAPeverywhichwaywecan, it will show vignettes of breast cancer experiences in both men and women, from puberty to old age. It will be multimedia, and will involve the audience.

"We shouldn't allow ourselves to be victims," he said, adding that through education, and with the help of support groups, people will insist on proper testing, diagnosis and treatment, and the medical profession will recognize and respond to their demands.

For more information, or to contact Meister, e-mail malebreastcancer18@yahoo.com or telephone 416-789-9047.

Acts of kindness restore faith

By SHARON SALSBERG

Guest Voice

My husband and I were high school sweethearts. Sept. 9, 2005, was our 21st wedding anniversary, but there was no celebration.

Six months ago, The CJN ran an obituary on my husband. He was 43 years old. Danny was always athletic, and was the athlete of the year in his graduating year of high school. He played quarterback on his University of Toronto intercollegiate football team and went on to become a high school math, science and physical education teacher. He was also the beloved coach of the baseball, basketball and volleyball teams.

There is always one favourite teacher in a school, and Danny was that teacher in each of the schools he taught in. He loved his job. He absolutely adored his two daughters. We had a wonderful marriage. Life in general was good.

Then, Danny died suddenly on March 20 of this year. He was playing floor hockey at the Y and collapsed halfway through the game. It was as if somebody had turned the switch off his heart – it just stopped.

For me, everything has stopped, too. I am lost without him. When they say you have had the rug pulled out from under you, that is an understatement. There is no balance and, of course, there is no understanding. The girls and I are floundering as we try to adjust to this new planet, where we must build a new home, forage for the food we eat, learn how to breathe the new air, and even make ourselves feel like a family again.

The pain is acute and has not diminished in six months either. The girls and I didn't even have the chance to say goodbye. We can't seem to get closure. But today, I do not want to focus on the pain. I want to talk about the humanity we have been witness to since this happened to us.

I want to focus on the good, not the people we thought were friends that have not been there for us, but on the people that have been there. There is no point in dwelling on the wrongs done to us. Today, I concentrate on all that is good. Not just family and old friends, but acquaintances and complete strangers who have now become part of our inner circle of friends as they have stepped up to the plate and beyond. Small miracles. Acts of kindness as I like to call them.

For example, the owner of the karate school where my daughter has been training since 2000 says we are family and Chelsea can train as much as she wants or needs to. The teachers have taken her under their wings and the school has given her a job. She is sempei, assistant teacher, and she is happy when she is there.

There is my dental office, where two brothers reign supreme. They are making sure we stay very healthy by insisting we keep up our regular regimen of dental care. I no longer have any benefits, but that hasn't stopped them from treating us. They even call us at home to make sure we aren't hiding any toothaches. Unheard of in dental offices my friends say. But I think they are just demonstrating not only their skills as great dentists, but also how much they care about their patients, their community.

Dan Salsberg

Then there is Annegail, who has made sure all along that I am getting fresh air and exercise by insisting we take walks often. There is Rhonda who took me grocery shopping from the beginning. It might not sound like a big deal, but I couldn't do it. And she did this with me whether she needed to grocery shop or not. And she did it until I could manage on my own. And then there is Ro, who never lets more than a few days go by before she calls, and comes to see me. And Larry, friend and accountant, who has filled out every form and application that needed attention and more.

During shivah, many strangers came to my house. None made an impression on me more than two young widows, Mara and Marlene. They also made an impression on everyone else in the house at the time. I remember very little of that time in my life (the brain does a remarkable thing blocking out bad stuff), but I remembered them and they have become dear friends. I have told them that I am happy to know them and call them friends, but I wish that I had never met either of them. Our paths never crossed before when our husbands were alive. It is such a shame. I think they would have very much liked one another. Why did this tragedy happen to the three of us? Why did I have to meet Mara and Marlene? And yet I am thankful that I did. These two women have been a lifeline for me. I draw what little strength I have from them. They are both beautiful and strong. They are a gift from heaven, from my husband.

I get therapy on a weekly basis with the most wonderful psychiatrist a crazy, sane or bereaved person could know. The Salsberg family knew him briefly, and when he heard about Danny, he called a mutual acquaintance and asked if this was the Salsberg family he knew. It was and he passed on the message that I should get in touch with him. I did and 10 days after Danny died, I was sitting in his office crying. Doctors don't usually seek patients out – this was something special. And he is.

New people in my bereavement group have become like family to me, and we have spent some quality time together. It is during that time that none of us feel alone. And through them, I have met even more people. Sari, for instance, who comes to visit, and who has offered her time and creative ideas to some of the many issues I now face.

Every day I ask Danny where he is, what he is doing, if he is okay, if he can come home now and can he please send me a sign. I have realized that it is these acts of kindness that are the signs from Danny. He was loved and respected and people are wanting to care of the three of us in his stead.

And so I struggle through every day, and the only saving grace besides my two lovely daughters are these acts of kindness. They have given me faith in humanity. They are like a big bear hug when you are feeling lonely, and provide warmth. Isn't that all anyone really needs? I can no longer get hugs from Danny, but I'm getting them from an awful lot of other people.

Family assisted by crisis counsellor

In the early days of Alicia's disappearance, the Fortis family were assisted by crisis counsellor Larry Nusbaum.

"He takes you to a place within yourself to find a feeling that for that time it takes away the bad and forces the good feelings within you to evolve and take over," Fortis said.

Although police have been investigating Alicia's disappearance for more than a month, they have not announced any breakthroughs in the case. "It's a slow, methodical process," Fortis said.

At this point, after so many difficult days, she is hoping for some sort of resolution.

"You need closure," she said. "Finding her is closure. God willing, she's alive, but even if she's not, it's not right that she's just out there. For me, closure means an end to this limbo existence. It's horrible."

Closure doesn't mean she's given up hope that Alicia will be found alive.

A member of the Gowlings firm in Calgary called Fortis to offer encouragement. "She said, 'There's no proof she's alive, but there's no proof she's not alive. So you must not give up,'" Fortis recalled.

This Rosh Hashanah, Fortis will attend services at Temple Har Zion, as she always does. And, as she always does, she will host a holiday dinner, but the thought of it without Alicia is difficult to imagine.

"Usually we have a house of close to 40 people for Rosh Hashanah," she said, wiping away tears. "I'm not doing it this year. Just our family."

Tennis stars play exhibition in aid of Israel Children's Centers

By MIRAY CHESKES-GRANOVSKY
Special to The CJN

Israeli doubles tennis players Jonathan Erlich and Andy Ram demonstrated why they're among the top 10 doubles partners in the world when they bested Daniel Nestor and Paul Beck 6-5 in an exhibition match in support of Israel Children's Centers.

The exhibition game at York Racquets Tennis Club was organized by Beck, York Racquets' tennis pro; board member David Granovsky (the writer's husband); and club member Kevin Green, president of the Canada-Israel Children's Centres.

The Israelis' big serves and tough returns proved too much for Nestor and Beck. After the entertaining match, Erlich and Ram hit some balls with the children in attendance, clearly enjoying themselves.

Currently ranked 10th in the world, the Israelis came to Toronto from the U.S. Open, where they reached the quarterfinals before succumbing to Wayne Black and Kevin Ullyett of Zimbabwe, 6-4, 6-2. Unfortunately, Erlich had contracted the flu the night before the match and his play was affected.

Ram reached the semi-finals at the Open with mixed doubles partner Dinara Safina of Russia, the younger sister of top 10 singles player Marat Safin. After playing in Toronto, Erlich and Ram returned to Israel for a few weeks before competing at the Davis Cup in Zimbabwe later this month.

"It is a great honour to represent Israel at the Davis Cup," Ram said. "We want [the Israeli team] to stay in the top group. We are playing great at the moment. Hopefully the whole team will play well. We have good potential."

Erlich and Ram, both émigrés to Israel from South America, began their tennis careers as youngsters at the Israel Children's Centers. The centres are "the best thing that happened to us," said Ram.

Erlich and Ram, who coach themselves, often return to the Israel Children's Center at Ramat Hasharon to train and play with the kids. Growing up, Ram idolized Israeli tennis great Amos Mansdorf.

"We want to be top players and play our best. We hope that young kids will want to play like us one day," said Erlich.

Erlich, 28, and Ram, 25, became good friends as teenagers playing tennis at the Wingate Institute near Tel Aviv.

In 2001, they decided to play together and found they connected well on the court. After winning several tournaments as a team, Ram was sidelined by injuries in 2002 and unable to play for the entire year. Back and knee surgery left him on crutches for three months struggling to walk, followed by a year-long recovery process.

Erlich and Ram reunited in June 2003 and burst onto the international tennis scene a month later at Wimbledon. On a whim, the pair decided to play the qualifying rounds and found themselves in the semifinals against defending doubles champions Jonas Bjorkman and Todd Woodbridge.

Though Erlich and Ram have yet to win a Grand Slam event, they have won major tournaments in Lyon and Rotterdam and they reached the finals at the Rogers Cup in Montreal and the Mercedes Benz Cup in Los Angeles earlier this summer.

Erlich and Ram are very aware of their role as representatives of Israel on the international stage.

"We are proud to be Israeli, [to be] Jewish. As Israelis we try to be the best ambassador that we can for the country. [We] try not to get political but focus on the bigger picture and talk about the people and the country," Erlich said.

"We have never had difficulty because we are Israeli or Jewish. Everyone respects us on tour," added Ram.

Erlich and Ram complement each other well both on and off the court. Erlich is more serious and reflective, while Ram is fun-loving and gregarious. Erlich's sharp sense of humour brings out Ram's infectious smile.

When asked why they play well together, Erlich explained that they have "great chemistry, [that is] very important for a doubles team to make it. It's not easy to be together 24 hours a day, like in a marriage."

"We were good friends before, outside of the court," Ram added. "We can do everything well. When we're on, we can beat every team in the world today. We are working on keeping our game consistent."

Their biggest weapon in a match? "Andy's smile," Erlich joked.

Pond hockey championship a throwback to sport's earliest days

Pond hockey teams are being invited to register for the first-ever Source For Sports Canadian National Pond Hockey Championships, with the chance to see the winning lineups in lights at the Hockey Hall of Fame.

The tournament will take place from Jan. 27 to Jan. 29 at the Deerhurst Resort in Huntsville, Ont., and is open to men 25 years and over and women 19 years and over (as of Jan. 1, 2006).

Neil Lumsden, the tournament's executive director, expects it will attract hundreds of recreational players in a celebration of hockey's roots.

"Pond hockey is the great leveller," Lumsden said. "A local team that has honed its skills on the frozen ponds could be the ultimate champions."

Men's and women's teams can register until Oct. 14 at www.canadapondhockey.ca. Teams can have up to five members, although shifts are limited to four per side. Some 120 men's and women's teams are expected to compete.

The championship is attracting corporate sponsors from across Canada, including Source For Sports. Proceeds from every team's registration are earmarked for the Source For Sports' designated charity, Shoot For A Cure, a hockey-focused charity with a mission to educate Canadians about spinal cord injuries.

The Pond Hockey Championships, to be played on six acres of natural ice, feature few rules (except those focused on safety and fair play), no goalies and no on-ice officials.

The tournament is a throwback to hockey as it was originally conceived more than a century ago – played on frozen ponds, rivers and lakes across Canada.

Pond hockey has no face-off circles and few stoppages in play, except when goals are scored, the puck goes out of bounds or a player is called for an infraction. In all those cases, possession is turned over to the opposing team.

There are no blue lines and no off-sides, making for lots of dramatic rink-length passes. And with no goalies, the job of protecting the four-by-eight-foot nets is left to the defence. Rink-side officials will control the games.

Love on The CJN's back page

Dear Avrum:

When I was younger I fantasized about my prince charming riding a white horse, taking my breath away, and sweeping me off my feet. I imagined what he looked like, what he did for a living, the things we would do together. I dreamed of walking down a sandy beach in a gorgeous white gown with my hair in curls. I pictured the castle my prince and I would live in. Eventually, I grew up, had many relationships, and the fairy tale slowly started to disappear. But there was always a faithful part of me that clung to the smallest bit of hope that one day it would all still come true.

I knew you were my bashert (soulmate) on July 7, 2004, when we kissed outside your office for the first time. You laughed and said, "There's nothing like a first kiss. We will always remember this." It only got better from there.

Friends told me timing is crucial in relationships. Perhaps that's why we met when we did and not sooner. As columnists for The CJN (on the same page!), we had never met. I lived right down the street from you for years and worked directly across from your office building, yet our paths never crossed. It was not coincidence, but fate, that eventually led me to inquire about helping those we call the "homeless" and volunteering at Ve'ahavta.

You graciously offered me half an hour of your time, but I stayed at your office for most of the afternoon. I was mesmerized by your life views, your creativity, your charm, your enthusiasm for humankind, your unbelievable sense of humour, and those famous sky blue eyes.

I had to see you again, and since I'm not old fashioned, I e-mailed you that night. After several fascinating phone conversations, we set up a first date. I was nervous all day and spent the hour prior to our date in the bathroom thinking I was going to be sick. I changed my clothes 10 times.

You met me dressed in black motorcycle gear with your extra large Suzuki cruiser proudly parked outside the restaurant. (A white horse comes in many forms). Over pancakes and pitas, you shocked me with your honesty and charmed me with your passion.

You didn't flinch during our marathon second date (14 hours) when I asked you how many kids you wanted. On our third date, I said I would join you in your mission to travel the world and spread the message of tikkun olam and peace.

You immediately inspired me to be a better person. Your desire to learn is contagious, your thoughts are enlightening and your love is like no other. Every time you walk in the room, my heart sings. Every time you smile at me, my insides melt. When your beautiful and compassionate soul reached out to mine, it was as if it had been searching for years and we were finally reunited.

A year later, as we paddled our canoe upstream along Balsam Lake and you said I was the woman of your dreams, that you wanted to build a home together, have a family together, and grow old together, my life felt complete. When you proposed on Sept. 2 – in my tiny apartment that I can't wait to finally move out of – and asked me to marry you, you made me the happiest woman in the world.

Later that night, as I admired my new sparkling ring, I thought back to my fictitious prince charming. You have far surpassed any fairy tale I could ever have dreamed up on my own. You are the man who continues to take my breath away and sweep me off my feet – and it is so much better than I ever imagined.

I promise to always make you happy, to take care of you, to never stop having fun, and to be your best friend and wife forever.

Love,
Miriam

"Jews in history"

By JOE KING

Harry Halton (1922-2003) designed Canadair/Bombardier business jets that were developed into the company's highly successful regional jets – the RJs.

The immigrant from Czechoslovakia was involved in the design and manufacture of virtually every new aircraft for Bombardier, from the late 1940s on. In later years, laid low by illness, he was surprised when the company president appeared at his hospital bedside and stated "Harry, we need you to design a new aircraft."

He partially recovered and designed the Challenger business jet. From that design came the RJs – and billions of dollars in orders.

Halton was born in Pilsen, Czechoslovakia, and grew up fascinated by aircraft. Whenever he could, he would visit the airport to watch the activity. "I wasn't interested in flying them. I wanted to build them."

When World War II broke out, the family shipped the 16-year-old to London where he ultimately studied electrical engineering.

Harry Halton

His income in London came from selling 24 cases of Pilsen beer his father sent him weekly.

In 1948, he moved to Montreal and joined Canadair where he became a major designer. His projects included a remote-controlled drone, then a water bomber.

He had a leg problem, and operations left him paralyzed from the waist down. Undaunted, when his bosses visited him and asked, "How would you like to work on the Challenger business jet?" Halton, in fever and in pain, began to work on the project from his hospital bed. Engineers, technicians, secretaries and others from Canadair came to the hospital to receive directions from the aircraft designer.

In time, Halton went back to work in a wheelchair, and the Challenger, the world's first wide-body business jet became a reality. And from that basic design came a host of developments which made Canadair/Bombardier one of the largest manufacturers of business and regional jets in the world.

In his downtown Montreal apartment, Halton was surrounded by precise models of every plane he designed.

We're getting married!

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Dear Miriam,

Mazel tov on our engagement. What a simchah! What a reason to dance throughout the night.

Mir, you know, being 45 and single, a lot of people thought I might just be one of those guys who would be the eternal bachelor. Others figured I had some serious intimacy problems that I had to work through (they weren't entirely wrong), and some figured I was gay – not that there's anything wrong with that.

Then one fine morning, fiancée, you dropped by Ve'ahavta to volunteer. You charmed me with your wit and beauty, like Elizabeth Taylor did with Richard Burton, and the rest is history.

I fell in love with you, Miriam – as the patriarch Yitzchak did with Rivkah – the moment I saw you. I was drawn into your dancingly mischievous eyes, and I was intent upon becoming one with you. We felt right. You captivated me then, and you continue to mesmerize me today. You snagged me, Mir.

And you did because we share some very important values that are predicated on our desire to make the world a better place – tikkun olam. You get my overwhelming angst, my fear of stepping on ants, and my passion for the Jewish people and our gift of "growth."

Although I was often snail-ish in understanding you, I fell in love with your humanitarian nature and your authenticity in befriending Allan, a tired but colourful character who frequently lived on or near the street.

In the spirit of Jewish wisdom, you showed me the meaning of the adage in Pirkei Avot (Ethics of our Fathers) "Who is a wise person? One who learns from everyone." And I was drawn to your ability to light up a room with your larger-than-life character, as well as your desire to make me a better man and the fact that you crack me up, my dear vaudevillian partner.

Miriam Porter, now that I have asked you to marry me, I am amazed at the calm I feel in my gut. Don't get me wrong, I'm scared – OK, sometimes downright terrified – about the transition from being single to being married. But I'm committed to you, and I'm dedicated to our hand-in-hand promenade through life and the inevitable – though I hope rare – struggles that will tap on our door.

I feel great happiness in my heart and a sense that all is well. The loneliness I felt for so long is slowly dissipating, and I think my sister, Chavie, might have a point when she says that "love and marriage is an everlasting bond between two people, something that doesn't stop here on earth but continues in the world to come."

Mir, for a while now, we've joked that "we are on the same page," referring to our columns here on the back page of The CJN. Now, we truly are. We're hooked, bound together as lifelong friends, lovers and partners. We're now on the same page in life, and our editors are our hearts and devotion.

Thank you for sticking by me, despite my craziness. I love you for that (and even though you refuse to get married at a brown bag picnic in Earl Bales Park). I will always remember your belief in our future from the moment I tried to impress you with my Suzuki Intruder 1500 Motorcycle (with genuine soft leather side bags).

Mir, I love you so much today, and I will love you even more tomorrow. I hope you are, and will always be, satisfied with the volunteer task we gave you at Ve'ahavta on that memorable day a year ago – me. I will treasure you always. You are my gift.

Mazel tov to us. Mazel to the world! Miriam Porter – I love you!

As the new year begins...

We find hope in the future

Among the many splendours of the photo on this page, in addition to its joyful content and its widely diverse mixture of individuals, is the fact that it conveys a moment of "ordinary," Jewish life.

The Chassid plays his guitar alongside a soldier who plays his accordion alongside a fully engaged, though otherwise nondescript, trumpet player. This eclectic trio is providing the musical accompaniment for the celebration of hachnasat sifrei Torah – the installation of Torah scrolls.

These Torah scrolls were from one of the former Jewish communities in Gaza, and they are being installed in a synagogue in the newly emerging seaside community of Nitzan, just north of the Gaza Strip.

The procession includes many former Gush Katif residents and moves along the barren, still unfoliated main street of the rebuilding community. No trees or flowers or shrubs have yet been planted. But they will be.

Editorial

Most of the people in the forefront of the photo are singing. Some are even dancing. But not all. Some, we can see, are engaged in the very Israeli activity of serious conversation, not really attentive to the preoccupation of the majority, but joining the parade nevertheless. In addition, many of the participants, outwardly at least, seem not to be observant. But they, too, seem to greatly appreciate the happy transcendence of the moment and want to be part of it.

And, as in most Israeli religious festivities, the women are at the back of the parade, looking on from the margins. In other words, despite the importance of the moment, the profound symbolism of the occasion, – the renewal of community and the testament to the irrepressibility of the Jewish will to live – there is also a sense of the everyday, of the "routine."

But that should not surprise us. For even in the grander moments, our lives are still imperfect. Indeed, only in many of those "ordinary" moments do we actually see life's true grandeur.

The celebration of the installation of these Torah scrolls is one such moment – ordinary and grand at the same time. And in one of those eerie though exhilarating coincidences of Jewish life, it is also a visible representation of one of recurring readings of Rosh Hashanah.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Jewish Groups Testify

OTTAWA — Representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada testified last week before a parliamentary committee reviewing the federal Anti-Terrorism Act about ways to improve the four-year-old law. CJC general counsel Mark Freiman said Congress supports the law, but recommends adding a preamble and regulations forbidding profiling by ethnicity or religion, the Globe and Mail reported. He added, however, that profiling by country of origin is OK. David Matas, B'nai Brith's senior legal counsel, told the MPs the law should be changed to make incitement to terror a crime, as in Britain. He also said Canada's State Immunity Act should be changed to allow terror victims to sue states that sponsor terrorism.

Ex-minister Honoured

TORONTO — Former federal solicitor general Robert Kaplan was given France's highest civilian honour this week in Toronto. Daniel Jouanneau, French ambassador to Canada, gave Kaplan a medal as a chevalier of France's Legion of Honour for promoting Canadian-French relations, and for his support for the Francophonie and the French language in Canada.

SFU Hillel Opens

VANCOUVER — Jewish students at Simon Fraser University started school this month with a new Hillel House. Hillel's first permanent space at the 40-year-old Burnaby, B.C., university was dedicated at a Sept. 11 event attended by SFU president Michael Stevenson. It hosted its first Shabbat dinner Sept. 23. A campaign to replace the Hillel House across town at the University of British Columbia is underway.

School in New Home

VANCOUVER — King David High School, Vancouver's co-educational Jewish community secondary school, moved into a new building this month. Now located across the street from the city's Jewish Community Centre, the school has 137 students, up 48 from last year. The new facility, built with the help of a grant of more than $15 million from the Diamond family, was officially dedicated Sept. 25.

Post Settles Lawsuit

TORONTO — The National Post and columnist David Frum have settled a defamation suit filed by the Council of American-Islamic Relations Canada (CAIR-CAN) and its chair Sheema Khan stemming from two columns last fall that criticized the group and Khan. A statement published Sept. 17 in the Post said that "David Frum and the National Post acknowledge that neither [Khan] nor [CAIR-CAN] advocates or promotes terrorism" and that the group is "a national grassroots organization with the stated purpose of empowering Canadian Muslims through community education."

WORLD

France Honours Rashi

PARIS — France is celebrating the 11th-century rabbi and famed Bible and Talmud commentator known as Rashi. Celebrations include a commemorative stamp, a medal being minted at the treasury, scholarly conferences and the renaming of an esplanade in the city of Troyes, where Rashi lived from 1040 to 1105 and founded a school of Torah and Talmud study. "He has a particular importance in biblical exegesis, not only in the Jewish world but for Christians as well," Rabbi Claude Sultan, director of the Rashi University Center in Troyes, told Agence France Press.

JDLer Sentenced

LOS ANGELES — A Los Angeles court last week sentenced a member of the Jewish Defence League to 20 years in prison for plotting to bomb a mosque and the office of an Arab-American congressman. U.S. District Court Judge Ronald Lew handed Earl Krugel the maximum sentence Sept. 22 for his role in the 2001 plot, which targeted the King Fahd Mosque in Culver City, Calif., and a regional office of Republican Darrell Issa. Three years in prison will be counted against the sentence for Krugel, 62, who expressed remorse. JDL leader Irv Rubin, also arrested in the case, died in 2002 in controversial circumstances in prison.

Okanagan Jews Mark JCC's Bar Mitzvah

KELOWNA, B.C. — The Okanagan Jewish Community Centre held a "Look How Far We've Come" celebration dinner earlier this month to mark its 13th year.

Close to 60 guests were treated to a video taken at the building's 1992 dedication. The evening's MC was Ray Turner, with brachot before and after the meal by student rabbi Daniel Mikelberg.

Daniel Mikelberg says Hamotzi over challah.

Famed Nazi hunter dies at 96

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Simon Wiesenthal, the man who perhaps more than anyone else made the prosecution of Nazi war criminals a moral imperative, died last week in his home in Vienna. He was 96.

Known by many as the conscience of the Jewish people, Wiesenthal made the pursuit of war criminals his life's work. He said he could not do otherwise, as he felt the millions of murdered Jews demanded justice from their killers.

Wiesenthal is widely credited for helping pave the way for the capture of Adolf Eichmann in Buenos Aires by Israeli operatives some 15 years after the war. His capture, trial and execution in Israel in May 1961 set off a series of Nazi trials and brought the issue of Nazi war criminals into the limelight.

Wiesenthal played a part in the arrest of Franz Stangl, the commandant of the Treblinka and Sobibor concentration camps, and in the arrest of 1,100 other Nazis with blood on their hands.

Simon Wiesenthal

He lent his name to the creation of an organization based in Los Angeles, with an office in Toronto, aimed at bringing Nazi war criminals to justice and confronting racism and prejudice.

Despite the presence in Toronto of an office of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, Wiesenthal declined to visit Canada. As he told The CJN in an interview in March 1993, he was disappointed that Canada had done so little to bring to justice Nazis and Nazi collaborators who entered Canada illegally following World War II.

He noted that Justice Jules Deschenes reported to the government in 1986 that there were 26 pressing cases that required quick court action, and that only a handful ever went to trial.

Accolades for Wiesenthal and his work poured in from many quarters last week, including from the Canadian government, whose reluctance to prosecute war criminals he disdained.

"The work of Mr. Wiesenthal and the organization that bears his name has had a significant influence on Canada and has contributed to the creation of our own War Crimes Program, designed to examine all allegations concerning the presence in Canada of suspected war criminals from the World War II era or more recent conflicts," Prime Minister Paul Martin said in a statement.

"Canada stands with others to acknowledge the immeasurable contribution this man has made to the fight against impunity and for accountability for the most serious crimes," Martin said.

Jewish organizations applauded Wiesenthal and his legacy.

Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean and founder of the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles, said, "I think he'll be remembered as the conscience of the Holocaust. In a way he became the permanent representative of the victims."

Rabbi Hier recalled that Wiesenthal once said, "'When history looks back, I want people to know the Nazis weren't able to kill millions of people and get away with it.'"

Ted Tulchinsky had just completed his medical internship when conscience called him to Saskatchewan in 1962. Doctors had gone on strike to protest and try to derail the introduction of medicare.

It was clearly a turning point in the young doctor's life. While practising medicine in Saskatchewan, he met Joan Douglas (the daughter of former New Democratic Party federal leader Tommy Douglas), fell in love, married, started a family and planned for their future, which would ultimately entail a life together in Israel.

From the editor's desk

Although a skilled practitioner, Tulchinsky wanted to expand his thinking about health-care service. Thus, three years into his medical practice in Saskatoon, he won a scholarship to Yale University to study public health. After Yale, the Tulchinskys moved to St. Catharines to help start a UAW-sponsored health clinic.

But Tulchinsky's thinking on the subject continued to grow. He was soon able to test even wider thinking as an adviser to the government of Manitoba. Eventually he became the deputy minister of health in the Ed Schreyer government of Manitoba.

Then, in 1976, some 14 years after he graduated from medical school, he and Joan and their three children, Daniel 11, Joel, 10, and Karen, 3, moved to Israel. Tulchinsky's experience, expertise and enthusiasm in the field of public health care were a serendipitous blessing for Israel. And it was in that field the Brantford-born doctor worked for more than 25 years for the Jewish state.

The Tulchinsky health-care blessing, however, was twofold. For Joan was an expert in nursing at Hadassah Hospital in the geriatric department and then as head nurse of the hospital's intensive-care unit. She was recognized by her peers who selected her for the hospital's outstanding nurse award.

Tulchinsky retired in 2001. He had, by then, been teaching at the Hebrew University's Braun School of Public Health in Hadassah and his reputation as a public health specialist had caught the attention of officials at various international agencies. In 1992, he was invited by the World Bank, which was then trying to reorient and rehabilitate Russia's infrastructure, to go to the former totalitarian country to consult with authorities there about the state of its public health-care system. He also co-authored a textbook on public health care, The New Public Health, which has been translated into seven languages.

The conversation with Ted and Joan was exhilarating, even though, or perhaps because, their understated manner was so incongruously at odds with the nature of the important work and unfolding history with which they had been involved.

The Tulchinskys moved to Israel because as Ted told The CJN, "It was now time to try to realize the dream I held since my teenage years.

"It was something that Joan and I both wanted to do," he adds. "Tommy [his father-in-law] supported us in our decision. He supported Joan in her conversion. He understood that she had made a life-long commitment. He also visited us in Israel."

Tulchinsky supervised the delivery of health care for the Palestinians from 1980-81 to 1994 as the co-ordinator for health services in the West Bank and Gaza. He was not only in charge of the overall program but also worked in the field.

Under his watch, a sophisticated immunization system was developed there. Gaza, he proudly pointed out, was one of the first places in the world to eradicate measles. After Oslo, in 1993, Israel turned over responsibility for health-care services to the Palestinians.

"At the beginning, they co-operated with us. But it was soon apparent that [former Palestinian president Yasser] Arafat had given orders to stop all levels of co-operation – health or otherwise – with the Israelis. For a certain period of time, there were still low-level contacts. I was the liaison with the Palestinians. But even that stopped," he said ruefully.

"Israel has lost much of its glow in the eyes of the world since its early days. The Arabs' propaganda has been sophisticated and successful. Yasser Arafat was one of the great propagandists of the 20th century. But even with its failings, Israel's achievements are magnificent.

"The years of war have been tough," he continued, "though the people's spirit has not waned. A fulfilling life can be had in Israel, but it is not given to you on a platter. Life is not simple there. You pay a price, financially and emotionally. But, as with all things, an individual must have the courage to follow his or her dreams.

"I believe I have made useful contributions in Israel in the realm of public health," Tulchinsky says self-effacingly in answer to my question.

"But the greatest thing, above all in my life has been Joan. Without Joan, I don't know if we would have made aliyah or have been as successful as we were. She was the stability that guided us through very tough times."

I marvelled at Ted and Joan Tulchinsky for their commitment to each other and to the important causes in their lives. I marvelled, too, that there was such a strong connection between Tommy Douglas, the man whom Canadians voted the Greatest Canadian Ever, in a CBC-sponsored poll, and Israel. Indeed, some of his grandchildren are Israeli!

The Board of Directors of along with our members throughout Canada deeply mourn the death of Simon Wiesenthal.

"Simon Wiesenthal was the conscience of the Holocaust. When the Holocaust ended in 1945 and the whole world went home to forget, he alone remained behind to remember. He did not forget.

He became the permanent representative of the victims, determined to bring the perpetrators of the history's greatest crime to justice. There was no press conference, and no president, prime minister, or world leader announced his appointment. He just took the job. It was a job no one else wanted.

The task was overwhelming. The cause had few friends. The Allies were already focused on the Cold War, the survivors were rebuilding their shattered lives and Simon Wiesenthal was all alone, combining the role of both prosecutor and detective at the same time.

Overcoming the world's indifference and apathy, Simon Wiesenthal helped bring over 1,100 Nazi War Criminals before the bar of Justice." - Rabbi Marvin Hier, Dean and Founder of the Simon Wiesenthal Center.

Simon Wiesenthal said,
"The most important thing I have done is to fight against forgetting".
Likewise, we will never forget Simon Wiesenthal.

Neighbour confesses in Ross case

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Six weeks of uncertainty, dread, hope and fear came to an end last week for the family of Alicia Ross when the family's next door neighbour confessed to killing the 25-year-old woman.

Now begins a period of mourning and perhaps the "closure" that Sharon Fortis, Alicia's mom, asked for only days before Daniel Sylvester confessed to the crime.

Sylvester, the Fortis' 31-year-old unemployed neighbour, appeared in court briefly last week on charges of second-degree murder. Accompanied by his lawyer, David Hobson, Sylvester turned himself in to police on Wednesday last week. Afterwards, police located human remains in two rural locations northeast of Toronto, one near the Sylvesters' Kawarthas cottage near Cobokonk, another near the village of Manilla, west of Lindsay.

Two weeks ago, Fortis told the media, including The CJN, that she needed a resolution to the mystery of her daughter's disappearance. "You need closure," she said at the time. "Finding her is closure. God willing, she's alive, but even if she's not, it's not right that she's just out there. For me, closure means an end to this limbo existence. It's horrible."

Alicia Ross

Sylvester's lawyer said his client turned himself in because he felt bad for Ross' family. "He's feeling great remorse. His conscience got the better of him. He's prepared to let the law take its course. He's feeling that the family next door needed closure," Hobson told reporters at the Newmarket Criminal Court. "He feels another person might have been unjustly prosecuted."

Hobson suggested that prior to his client's admission, the police had no evidence linking Sylvester to the disappearance.

Ross was last seen before midnight on Aug. 16 after spending the evening with her boyfriend, Sean Hine. They had been playing pool at the Fortis' home on Bronte Road.

Hine, whom police early in their investigation had described as "a person of interest," said he had called Ross 15 minutes after leaving her at midnight. When she didn't answer that call as well as one early the next morning, Hine called police and reported her missing.

After searching a 600-metre radius around the Fortis home, police theorized that Ross was abducted by someone she knew. Hine acknowledged that police were questioning him, and in the days after her disappearance, he said, they considered him a prime suspect. "I'm going to need therapy when this is all done," he said.

Sylvester, the son of Grant Sylvester, founder of a major financial services company, pleaded guilty to second-degree murder, which carries a life sentence and a minimum 10 years in jail before being eligible for parole.

Ross has been described as an energetic young person with a zest for life. She loved the outdoors and visited Israel on a birthright mission. Fortis said she fell in love with the country and returned to camp in the Negev.

Ross had taken a new job in computer marketing that was to begin less than a week after she disappeared.

No life is ordinary

The Haftorah for the second day of the holiday is an extremely moving statement of consolation by the prophet Jeremiah to his troubled people. It could have been written as a caption for the photograph on page 1.

"Restrain your voices from weeping, hold back the tears from your eyes, because your struggles will be rewarded… you will return from the land of the enemy… there is hope in your future… and your children will return to their own borders." (Jeremiah 31: 16-17)

Of this passage, the renowned American scholar, the late Rabbi Hayyim Herman Kieval, wrote some four decades ago that "these prophetic words have been fulfilled in epic proportions before our eyes."

He was referring both to the collective, national return of the Jewish people to the Land of Israel and to the individual, personal "returning to the spiritual fold of Israel" by "many Jewish artists, intellectuals and men of affairs."

Jeremiah's words are a call to conscience.

"There is hope in your future," he said.

Hope, he well understood, is the essence of every future. Indeed what future could there be for us, for anyone, without hope?

That Israel's (and the Jewish people's) national anthem is called Hatikvah, "The Hope," is not merely a felicitous statement of lyrics. Rather, it is a statement of purpose and an acknowledgment of our history.

Isn't that the key message of Rosh Hashanah and the Yamim Nora'im: that at the heart of these holy days is the opportunity to embrace, if not re-embrace, that personal and collective sense of hope?

This is the time of year when all our possibilities lie before us like an untilled field waiting for our recommitment, for our labour and for some good luck as well to help bring forth the flowers that are the colours and texture of our hope.

"And your children will return to their own borders," Jeremiah added.

Whether he intended those "borders" to be geographic, as embodied in the Zionist dream, or theological, existential, psychological, emotional, personal as embodied in the individual dream, the notion of "returning" must encompass a sense that it is to a place that is our own, in which we are at home, namely to the feeling that to belong to the Jewish people is to belong to a wondrous people of long history, high purposes, deep values, commitment to the well-being of all God's creations and a constantly emerging hopeful future.

Just as the photo on page 1 teaches that in every momentous event there are also elements of the ordinary, it also teaches that no life is ever unimportant because of its ordinariness.

Indeed no life is ever ordinary.

Rosh Hashanah is when we learn this truth anew.

Shanah tovah.

The passing of Simon Wiesenthal

The passing of Simon Wiesenthal is a sad event for the entire world. He was truly the conscience of the Holocaust, someone who ensured that one of history's most depraved episodes of mass murder and collective cruelty was always on our minds – whether we liked it or not.

He was an extraordinary man, who, because of his tenacity and will, refused to take no for an answer when it came to alerting the world about the perpetrators of the Holocaust. He taught us that one person can change the world.

As chair of the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto, I work with hundreds of Holocaust survivors who teach the lessons of anti-Semitism to more than 25,000 Ontario students every year. Wiesenthal's unrelenting mission to bring Nazi war criminals to justice has given me and those survivors the inspiration to carry on.

Wiesenthal pursued truth and justice. That will be his ultimate legacy.

Israelis can own land in Jordan

Upon reading "Cast-in-stone assumptions" ("From the editor's desk," CJN, June 2) that indicated that after Israel's War of Independence, as a result of Jordanian law, Jews but not Israelis were prohibited from owning land in Jordan, I took it upon myself to confront Jordan's ambassador to Canada, asking for confirmation that such a law was passed, and also asking since there was normalization between Israel and Jordan, why such a law would be allowed to exist. The ambassador referred my letter to relevant Jordanian authorities and he advises that no such law exists. He points out that Judaism is a religion and not a nationality and therefore according to Jordanian law, Jews are allowed to own land in Jordan. Further he advises that citizens of Israel are allowed to own land in Jordan according to Jordanian law, just as the citizens of any other country are.

Just as we are quick to criticize Arab countries as being racist and discriminatory, so must we honestly report when they are not.

Identifying as a Jew on campus

Gershon Richter's description of his experiences at the University of Manitoba raises profound questions about his understanding of the situation on Canadian campuses ("The realities of being Jewish on campus," CJN, Sept. 15).

Richter's admission that "when asked by other students why I can't make it to certain classes or exams, I sometimes find myself debating whether to tell them the truth [about being Jewish] or make up some sort of excuse…" and his recommendation to "take a little care… in volunteering information" sounds like a description of Jewish campus life in Poland in the 1930s, not Canada in the 21st century.

As a Jewish student who has studied at two Ontario universities with significant anti-Israel contingents, I was often asked about my background. The thought of avoiding the question never crossed my mind. Concealing your roots and denying your identity is not the answer to whatever hostility and intimidation one encounters. One must be ready to handle these questions in a mature manner and, if necessary, to defend your people, your religion and even your political views. The day that a university student cannot proudly identify himself as a Jew, the bigots will have won.

Religious discrimination in school funding

Ontario Progressive Conservative leader John Tory would be wise to carefully consider how to implement his promise to restore assistance to independent schools ("Protesters picket McGuinty over school funding," CJN, Sept. 22).

With 93 per cent of faith-based schools in Ontario already fully funded, there is a compelling need to eliminate the religious discrimination that excludes the other seven per cent solely because they are not Catholic. Religious discrimination in violation of basic international human rights law is unacceptable in today's multicultural Ontario. Tory should stake out the political high ground of human rights defender by designing the first stage of his independent school funding policy so that it focuses exclusively on fixing the discrimination by extending as much funding to non-Catholic faith-based schools as Catholic schools receive. A means test that applies to non-Catholics but not Catholics obviously doesn't fit with this approach.

Once the discrimination is fixed, then there may be sufficient public pressure to lead to the development of a broad political consensus on funding independent schools generally.

5765: a year of politics and promise

For Israel, the year is remembered most for disengagement

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and the northern West Bank dominated the year 5765. After months of rancorous confrontation with Jewish settlers and other opponents of the disengagement plan in the Knesset, in the courts and on the streets, the government moved in mid-August to evacuate 21 settlements in Gaza and four in the northern West Bank.

Despite warnings of possible civil war, the evacuation of Gaza's 9,000 settlers and a few thousand radical supporters took less than a week and was virtually free of serious violence. More than 50,000 army and police took part in the operation, on the assumption that the larger the evacuating contingent, the less force it would have to employ.

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon received warm praise from the international community for going through with his initiative despite strong domestic opposition. The withdrawal left the Palestinian Authority in control of Gaza and was widely hailed as a significant first step toward the establishment of a Palestinian state.

But Sharon's move alienated large sections of his own Likud party and left him fighting for his political life.

Sharon argued that the pullout was of vital strategic importance for Israel: it eases the demographic problem, creates better defensive lines, may earn Israel international backing and generates a dynamic that could lead to a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

But Sharon's opponents in the party characterized it as a huge strategic blunder. In handing over land to the Palestinians without demanding anything in return, they argued, Israel has encouraged more terrorism.

The disengagement opponents mounted a vigorous campaign. In the months leading up to the withdrawal, they lobbied in the Knesset, appealed to the Supreme Court, held mass demonstrations and blocked major roads.

They failed at every turn.

Their battle in the Knesset collapsed March 28, when legislators rejected a proposal for a referendum on the withdrawal by an overwhelming margin of 72-39.

Their court struggle ended June 9, when the Supreme Court denied petitions against withdrawal. And any hope they may have had of intimidating the authorities by sheer numbers evaporated when police successfully prevented an estimated 200,000 demonstrators from marching on the Gaza settlements from the nearby village of Kfar Maimon in late July.

The anti-disengagement forces finally won a victory when Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu resigned Aug. 7 – granted, just 10 days before the withdrawal was to begin – and announced that he would challenge Sharon for the Likud leadership and the premiership.

Netanyahu, a former prime minister, argued that in pushing disengagement through, Sharon had abandoned Likud principles and was no longer fit to lead the party or the nation. Netanyahu's challenge sparked speculation about a possible split in the ruling Likud party and a significant realignment of Israel's political map.

There were dramatic developments on the Palestinian side, too. Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, who was seen both by Israel and the United States as personally responsible for ongoing Palestinian terrorism, died Nov. 11, paving the way for the emergence of a more moderate Palestinian leadership.

Mahmoud Abbas, who was elected Jan. 9 to succeed Arafat, immediately renounced terrorism as inimical to the Palestinian cause. On Feb. 8, at a summit meeting at the Egyptian resort town of Sharm el-Sheik, Sharon and Abbas announced a ceasefire, ostensibly ending the bloody intifadah after more than four years.

Five weeks later, at a meeting held under Egyptian aegis in Cairo, Hamas and other Palestinian terrorist groups agreed to abide by the ceasefire until the end of 2005. As a goodwill gesture, Israel released 500 Palestinian prisoners in February, and 400 more in early June. Israel also handed over the West Bank cities of Jericho and Tulkarm to full Palestinian control in March.

In early May, however, Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz decided to freeze further planned hand-overs on the grounds that the Palestinian Authority was ignoring its commitments to dismantle terrorist groups and arrest or disarm wanted terrorists.

Despite the ceasefire, sporadic terrorist attacks continued, including suicide bombings in Tel Aviv in February, Netanya in July and Be'er Sheva in August, and the firing of hundreds of rockets and mortars at Israeli communities in and around Gaza before the evacuation.

Several analysts, including a former Israeli military chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon, warned that unless Israeli-Palestinian negotiations went forward, a new intifadah would erupt.

Although Sharon's disengagement policy enhanced Israel's already close ties with the administration of U.S. President George W. Bush, there were some glitches. Israel's decade-old plans to build in a key strategic area outside Jerusalem known as E-1, and its failure to remove 24 illegal West Bank settlement outposts, led to stern U.S. criticism.

A young boy, leaving the Gush Katif, takes a sapling with him to plant in his new home. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Israel and the United States also clashed over Israel's military relationship with China, specifically an Israeli contract to refurbish unmanned air vehicles it had sold to China.

After months of delicate negotiations between the Pentagon and Israel's Ministry of Defence, Israel bowed to an American demand to keep the UAVs rather than repair and upgrade them. The issue was resolved when, on Aug. 16, Israel and the United States signed a memorandum of understanding providing for prior consultations on potentially problematic arms deals.

The disengagement from Gaza and renewed dialogue with the Palestinians under Abbas led to improvements in Israel's international and regional standing. In February, the Jordanian ambassador, recalled soon after the outbreak of the intifadah in September 2000, returned to Israel. Egypt, the only other Arab country to have made peace with Israel, sent its ambassador back in March.

In April, Russia's Vladimir Putin paid the first-ever visit to Israel by a Soviet or Russian president. In July, Sharon – for years the focus of sharp criticism in Europe, especially France – was feted in Paris by the French government and lauded in the French media.

On Sept. 1, barely a week after the evacuation of the Gaza settlements, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom met publicly in Istanbul with his Pakistani counterpart, prompting speculation about imminent ties between Israel and the huge Muslim nuclear power, which had ostracized Israel in the past.

The year 5765 also marked the 60th anniversary of the liberation of the Auschwitz death camp and the end of the World War II. In mid-March, United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan, presidents, prime ministers and delegations from 40 countries attended the opening of a new Holocaust museum in Jerusalem. On May 5, Sharon took part in a ceremony at Auschwitz, where one million Jews perished between 1942 and 1945. And on May 30, Israeli President Moshe Katsav addressed Germany's Parliament.

The ceasefire with the Palestinians and the disengagement helped the Israeli economy recover from the battering it took during the intifadah, growing by about four per cent for the second straight year.

Other indicators also pointed to economic resurgence: nearly two million tourists were expected in 2005, an increase of half a million from 2004, double the number in 2003 and close to record pre-intifadah levels, and the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange reached new heights in the first weeks after disengagement.

There also were at least two major financial transactions: Israel's giant pharmaceutical company, Teva, became the largest generic drug producing company in the world after a $7.4 billion buyout of U.S.-based Ivax in August. And on June 30, Israel and Egypt signed a $2.5-billion (US) deal for the supply of natural gas from Egypt to Israel over the next 15 years. Opponents warned that the gas deal risked national security by giving a potentially hostile country a stranglehold on a key strategic resource, while backers said it would tighten Israeli-Egyptian ties that have remained cold despite a formal peace treaty signed 25 years ago.

A hero's other mission

It's probably fair to assume that few Canadians outside the Jewish community, or even those within it, would know much about the former chief of the Israel Defence Forces' southern command, Maj-Gen. Doron Almog.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Where his name has been most recognizable recently is in the context of a mid-September incident at Heathrow Airport in London. While on his way to England from Israel, Almog learned, via a message from the Israeli Foreign Ministry, that the London police's anti-terrorist and war crimes unit was waiting for him and that he would likely be detained if he entered Britain.

He was to be charged with violating the Geneva Conventions for his alleged involvement in "war crimes" during the intifadah. While the warrant for his arrest was based on only one incident – the demolition of a home in Rafah – it was expected that other, more serious accusations would also be levelled against him.

To avoid capture, Almog opted to remain on the El Al flight that brought him to England, and he later returned with it to Israel.

Almog is not the first Israeli to have his rights and freedom threatened by misguided and hypocritical European governments and their overly zealous bureaucrats, and he likely won't be the last. But that's a topic for another column. The objective of this one is to profile Almog, albeit very briefly, in a way that bypasses the ugliness of the Heathrow incident and focuses instead on the qualities and accomplishments that more accurately define him and his place in the Israeli narrative.

Almog has been widely credited for his achievements as head of the southern command, and deservedly so. During his tenure, not one attempt by terrorists in the Gaza Strip to enter Israel was successful. What should also not be forgotten is the pivotal role he played in the Entebbe rescue operation in 1976, when he was the first to land on the runway and mark the touch-down points for incoming Israeli aircraft.

But inasmuch as his outstanding military career will assure him of a lasting and illustrious legacy, a misfortune within his own family has motivated him in a direction that is, to all accounts, outside the usual realm of a military officer. As the father of a 20-year-old who has been severely impaired since birth, Almog has distinguished himself as a tireless advocate on behalf of disabled young Israelis. He currently chairs Aleh Negev, an initiative dedicated to establishing a rehabilitation village near Ofakim, in southern Israel, for mentally challenged adolescents and young adults.

The reason for his aborted trip to England a few weeks ago was, in fact, to raise awareness, and funding, for this most worthy project.

This great black hole

Once again, archeological discoveries in Jerusalem are at the centre of a storm of controversy and debate. Do, in fact, the recently uncovered stones in the City of David provide indisputable evidence of a palace from King David's time? The answer, it would seem, is of political more than intellectual interest. If authenticated, such evidence would lay to rest, once and for all, the allegations of certain Palestinian (but not exclusively Palestinian) ideologues that the Bible is primarily a fictional account with little foundation in the physical reality of ancient Jerusalem.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

Personally, I find this debate ridiculous. Does anyone actually believe that a people could have pulled off one of the most incredible feats of all time – the ingathering in its homeland of its long and widely scattered population – had it not possessed a deep-seated conviction about where it came from and where it belonged?

The desperate search for tangible proofs of our ancient physical presence in the Land of Israel, however, does draw attention to an interesting phenomenon – specifically, that we Jews, despite our more than 1,000 years of national life, bequeathed to posterity a surprisingly meagre material legacy. For a nation that contributed so greatly to the shaping of modern Western civilization, we have precious little in the way of surviving monuments to attest to that greatness.

Masada illustrates the point well. Its breathtaking mountaintop setting aside, one can't help but notice that there is remarkably little of human origin to see. The barren and level elevation is broken only infrequently by disorderly heaps of inferior grade construction decorated sparingly with undistinguished frescoes and mosaics. This fact, however, does not in any measure detract from the fascination of the place. For the story of Masada, and its relevance for our own lives today, rivets our attention far more than the things we are looking at.

This is an abiding truth in the Land of Israel, the great black hole of the ancient world. Vision, for the most part, turns inward, since it is as a crucible of ideas, Jewishly speaking, that this place holds sway over our imaginations, and not as a repository of relics. While other peoples invested so much of their creative energy in constructing monumental edifices of wood, stone and clay, we channelled our energies into the relentless pursuit of definitions of justice, morality and righteousness. Inert things on the scale of pyramids, sphinxes, palaces and shrines held little appeal for our abstract minds.

After all, human artifice smacked of idolatry, pagan excess and the polytheism we so disdained, reawakening troubling memories of the allure of the golden calf. And it's not without significance, I believe, that when at long last we did surrender to the temptation to permanently house our unhousable idea of God, we offered the job to a pagan king, Hiram the Phoenician, and that, in a later age, Herod patterned his Jerusalem and Temple complex after Roman architectural models.

A visit to the Israel Museum leaves one with the clear impression that the Israelite conquests of Canaan under Joshua set back the clock of material culture in the land by centuries – tent camps sprung up on the ruins of what had been mighty, fortified cities, and an awkward hand-worked pottery supplanted a refined ceramic art. We were only rarely the equal in any given age of the finest artisans among the peoples who were our closest neighbours – pagan, Christian or Muslim.

In the final analysis, great cultures are defined and judged by the timeless inspiration and fertility of their greatest minds and ideas. And not for nothing was our God impalpable and formless. Only such an elusive conception of a God can bequeath to the world an ever-evolving, inexhaustible and continuous inquiry into what should be deemed most worthy in human existence.

And if our foremost holy site is little more than a tottering wall full of weeds, it nonetheless speaks far more eloquently than do all the pyramids in Egypt with their gods and goddesses that nobody, outside of a select few, much cares to remember any more.

Re-stitching Israel's social fabric high on 5766 agenda

For Israelis and for Jews around the world, it's difficult to be optimistic – our history and our collective psychology give preference to a realistic and sometimes bitter cynicism. The few periods of hope in the past 3,000 years have been followed quickly by disasters, some that were self-inflicted and some that came from an uncompromisingly hostile world.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In 1948, the creation of Israel – a sovereign state for the Jews, equal to other nations of the world – and the victory following the Arab invasion were among the hopeful exceptions. But the wars and terror resumed, as did the domestic fights – Ben-Gurion versus Begin, religious versus secular, Ashkenazi versus Sephardi, and rich versus poor.

So why are Israelis smiling as we head into the New Year? Yes, the external and internal dangers are still out there, but they're perhaps less threatening than in previous years. We have come through the threat of civil war during disengagement – a scenario exaggerated by journalists and politicians who thrive on such divisions – with relatively limited damage.

This painful experience also showed the strength of our common bonds. Although the debate over unilateral disengagement was, and remains, very heated, what may appear to be a very divided Israeli society has sufficient cohesion to overcome these differences. If the calls from the fringe for soldiers to disobey orders had been heeded, it would have shredded the army into opposing factions. But most soldiers and rabbis recognized these dangers. And many Israelis who had little interest in the settlements in Gaza showed genuine empathy for the settlers, who now face the challenge of rebuilding their communities.

Nevertheless, there are some important cracks that need to be fixed before they grow wider. The recent debate highlighted a religious community that is divided between primary loyalty to the secular state on the one hand and to religious principles and leadership on the other. In theory, this conflict was resolved more than 100 years ago with the founding of religious Zionism, which sought to combine these spheres. But the combination is still tenuous, and the question of priority between the Torah and the flag, representing the state, came to the surface again in the conflict over withdrawal. To maintain their central and necessary roles in Israel's security and growth, the members of this community will need to reinforce the links between religious and political values.

This tension has been deepened by the revival of the old fight over credit for the success of Zionism and the revival of Jewish sovereignty.

The secular ideologists often claim that the rebellion against the European rabbinical establishment provided the source of political Zionism, led by Theodor Herzl and his early followers. In this version of history, religious Jews came later, and were secondary contributors to the diplomatic and military victories that led to the establishment of Israel. Similarly, they dismiss the religious settlement activity after the 1967 war as messianism without a realistic political foundation. The debate about the future of the settlements – particularly in Gaza and beyond the 1949-1967 "Green Line" – reflects this attitude, as do attempts by the religious communities to demonstrate that they contributed as much as the secular Labor movement to the building of Israel.

This is an absurd conflict that should have been resolved and forgotten many years ago. Zionism could not have succeeded without the close co-operation and dedication of both camps. The secular political vision of Jewish sovereignty needed the support and involvement of religious Jews, who constituted the vast majority of the population in Herzl's day. Millions of Orthodox Jews put a few coins aside every week for the rebuilding of Eretz Yisrael – the "Zion" in Zionism. Their massive political support turned Herzl's impossible dream into an unstoppable force. And the short-lived proposal to focus on building a Jewish state in Uganda (or Northern Rhodesia) went nowhere precisely because it was divorced from the religious vision.

This combination of secular and religious is as necessary now as it was then. And most Israelis understand the need to move forward to strengthen the core values that unite us, rather than backward to refight past battles. This basic unity provides the strength to begin the year 5766 on an optimistic note, despite the bitter echoes of Jewish history.

The Kirshner File

Mostly fine fare at Toronto's 30th film festival

This year's edition of the Toronto International Film Festival, the 30th, was one of the best, although not all the movies could be described as impressive.

Leonard Cohen, the Canadian poet, songwriter and novelist, is the subject of Lian Lunson's Leonard Cohen I'm Your Man, a 98-minute tribute to an international acclaimed cultural icon. The engaging documentary is a hybrid, unfolding through the medium of a rock concert, readings from Cohen's poems, interviews and personal photographs of his Montreal youth.

Sheldan Kirshner in Toronto

Singers ranging from Rufus and Martha Wainwright to Nick Cave and Beth Orton belt out his haunting, soulful songs, filling the night air with renditions of Everybody Knows, If It Be Your Will, Suzanne and so on. Cohen's vivid songs are instantly recognizable, being infused with an unmistakable poetic sensibility. As Cohen rightly observes, he has the advantage of actually being a published writer.

Bono, a concert participant, hails him as a craftsman. Perhaps too charitably, he compares Cohen to Keats and Byron and refers to the "otherness" of his language. Edge, Bono's U2 partner, pays Cohen the ultimate compliment by commenting that his songs are tinged with biblical resonance.

Cohen – whose gravelly voice bespeaks world-weary sophistication – discloses that stories from the Bible prompted him to embark on the path to poetry. Recalling Montreal friends such as Frank Scott, Irving Layton and Louis Dudek, Cohen remarks, "We really wanted to be great poets."

Talented as Cohen is, the task of coaxing words to paper is never an easy enterprise. He writes at least 10 versions of a song before the result finally satisfies him.

Though Cohen is a spiritual person – he speaks fondly of his association with a wizened Zen master in Los Angeles – he is surprisingly flashy. Rufus Wainwright, reminiscing about his first meeting with Cohen, found him in his undergarments boiling soba noodles. Later that day, Cohen made a grand entrance, resplendent in an Armani suit. That was Wainwright's "Leonard Cohen moment."

Watching Allan King's Memory for Max, Claire, Ida and Company, you cannot but think that the so-called "golden years" are in fact a myth. King's touching documentary, 112 minutes in length, takes place in Toronto's Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, and revolves around a group of women reflecting on their current circumstances.

A pioneer of the cinéma vérité style, King insinuates himself into their lives outside the framework of conventional narration and interviews. He lets them talk and let off steam, and they oblige with candour. And so we are privy to moments of loneliness, happiness, sadness and annoyance. As King lays bare their lives, we watch raptly. The Baycrest residents he highlights are, to various degrees, frail of mind and body and utterly dependent on caregivers.

A woman cries. "I'm lonesome. I miss my family. Why don't they come to see me?" Her son finally appears, but he and his wife are off to Florida on a winter vacation.

In a rare display of affection, a woman kisses Max, who is fond of roaming Baycrest's bright, antiseptic halls, a cane in hand. He blushes. When he dies after a fall, his lady friends mourn him. Love is certainly no stranger in seniors' homes. "I have a boyfriend downstairs," a woman boasts. "I like men. What can I tell you?" In general, the women miss their late husbands and remember them nostalgically.

Murray, a former dentist and sports fisherman, mumbles, his eyes are usually shut. Occasionally, his coherence gives way to lucidity. Memory often fails all of them. A woman has forgotten where she once lived. Her son gently reminds her. "That was a beautiful house," she says in amazement.

Some of the residents are physically fit. Boasting that her hair has yet to turn grey, a 93-year-old woman exults, "I feel young. I must be made of iron." She is a minority of one. Virtually everyone else is ailing and implicitly waiting for the journey of life to end, as King's film implies.

Roman Polanski's skilful adaptation of Charles Dicken's classic, Oliver Twist, summons up Victorian Britain with panache. The atmospheric London of gas lamps, cobble-stone streets, horse-drawn carriages and outdoor markets is perfectly rendered, while Ronald Harwood's screenplay is faithful to the spirit of the novel.

Ten-year-old orphan Oliver (Barney Clark), a pleasant enough lad, is tossed to and fro by a succession of unpalatable encounters that harden him. Fed up, he flees to the teeming underbelly of London, where he falls in with a gang of pint-sized pickpockets in the employ of Fagin (Ben Kingsley), a bent, rasping, obsequious "fence" whose scraggly beard, caftan and broad-brimmed hat mark him as a stereotypical Jew. Fagin is a far more sympathetic person than, say, Shylock, and Kingsley portrays him with brilliance. Clark is plausible as the boy whom fate ultimately smiles upon.

Rashid Mashrawi's Attente (Waiting) deals with the still unresolved issue of Palestinian national homelessness. Set in the Gaza Strip, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria, his feature film focuses on the contemporary world of Palestinians who eke out an existence in squalid refugee camps.

Ahmad (Mahmoud Massad), a cynical stage director, accepts one last job before his departure from Gaza for presumably greener pastures abroad. He hates living in Gaza, a "hellhole," and has tired of the struggle for Palestinian statehood. But because he is a patriot, he agrees to audition actors for the National Palestinian Theatre, which is being built with funds donated by the European Union. He is accompanied by Bissan (Areen Omari), a TV interviewer, and Mounir (Yousef Baroud), a cameraman. During their trips to the camps, they are torn by personality conflicts and stymied by a dearth of talent. But in the end, they are deeply affected by the simple refugees they meet.

Ben Kingsley as Fagin

Attente, whose intensity and comedic touches inspire emotional outpourings and levity, is filled with references to the standard Palestinian narrative and the yearning of Palestinians to return to their former homes in what is now Israel. Its central conceit is that everyone is waiting for something: Ahmad for talented actors and the Palestinians for a humane solution to their collective misery.

Amos Gitai's Free Zone boasts of a stellar cast, but the film is a great disappointment.

Rebecca (Natalie Portman), a half-Jewish American, is sitting in a car and crying softly, the rhythm of a Hebrew song humming in her ears. Hanna (Hanna Laslo), an Israeli who once lived in a settlement in the Sinai Peninsula, sits next to her, looking out the window as they approach the Jordanian border. The ostensible reason for their trip is sightseeing, but it is really about collecting an outstanding debt of $30,000 from a shadowy Palestinian American.

There are oblique references to personal identity and the Arab-Israeli dispute, but Free Zone is basically an exercise in futility, being opaque, pretentious, dull and pointless. Portman and Laslo are wasted.

The Passion of Joshua the Jew, an Italian period piece directed by Pasquale Scimeca, unfolds before, during and after the expulsion of Jews from Spain in 1492. The main character is a young man who, his parents believe, is destined to lead his people to the Promised Land. His journey ends in tragedy on a cross after he performs in a Passion Play. Themes such as anti-Semitism, religious coercion, messianism and redemption frame the movie.

The mood of impending doom is established in the first two scenes. "Burn the witch, burn the Jew," a man cries. "Get out of my way, you filthy Jew," shouts a frenzied Christian pilgrim.

There are stark images. One shows bedraggled Jewish and Muslim refugees leaving Spain in a ghostly procession. Another depicts a line of Jews trudging through a howling snowstorm in the mountains. Sadly, The Passion of Joshua the Jew is stilted and unfulfilling.

Adam's Apple, a black comedy and modern religious fable from Denmark's Anders Thomas Jensen, turns on a belligerent neo-Nazi whom a gentle priest tries to reform through an unusual method of therapy turning on baking an apple pie. The film, which explores the nature of good and evil, is rather plodding.

Noah Baumbach's The Squid and the Whale stars Jeff Daniels and Laura Linney as a supposedly Jewish academic couple at odds with each other. As their marriage crumbles, their sons look on in horror. Fine and compelling.

Prestigious awards for key community leaders

UJA Federation sponsors an evening of celebration

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

Around the world Toronto shines as one of the Diaspora's strongest, most dynamic and most generous Jewish communities and it is admired for its exceptional leaders. UJA Federation, last week, honoured them at an Evening of Celebration to toast the contributions of community leaders.

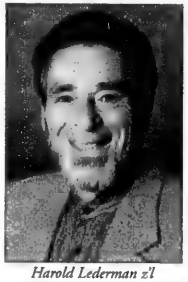
Barry Sherman, one of the world's leading philanthropists, received the Ben Sadowski Award of Merit, the community's most prestigious volunteer recognition award. The award honours a man, who, among his other achievements, was the first president of the United Jewish Welfare Fund, UJA Federation's predecessor. He was also instrumental in bringing Holocaust survivors to Canada, through the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC)

Ben Sadowski z'l

"Tonight's honouree embodies many of the same qualities as Ben Sadowski," said Sandy Brown,a former UJA Federation president and Sadowski award recipient. "Barry Sherman is a natural born leader, he has been devoted to improving the Jewish and general communities for many years and his commitment exemplifies a tradition of tikun olam (healing the world)."

Sherman described himself as a "reluctant recipient" of the award and shifted credit to UJA Federation for meeting the needs of millions of Jews. "Individually, we can do very little", he said. "We wouldn't even know where to begin."

Leo Goldhar was honoured with the first ever Harold Lederman award, presented to an outstanding philanthropic leader and volunteer extraordinaire in the community. Lederman was a generous philanthropist and a strong supporter of Jewish communal life. He was also one of Leo Goldhar's best friends and his business partner for decades.



Harold Lederman z'l

"I'm overwhelmed to be the first receipient of this award," Goldhar said "I conceived of this award to honour the memory of Harold and am very proud to be its first recipient."

Dodi Weill, a veteran UJA volunteer, was the recipient of the Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence named after a legendary Jewish community leader. The late Granovsky's wife Shirley, who presented Weill with her award, called her a "mensh for all seasons".

"Volunteering is about having a sense of purpose and keeping meaning in our lives," Weill said. "There is no better way to get involved with our community and to learn about the needs, both here and in Israel, than by volunteering."

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto Professional Advisory Committee Award of Excellence was given to Al G. Brown, while UJA Federation Campaign vice chair Brad Fox and UJA Federation Young Adult Division co-chair, Steven Farber were honoured with Leadership Development Awards.

The Shem Tov Awards were bestowed on nine individuals for their volunteer work with community agencies; Elena Aleinikov, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, Toronto (JIAS); David Barkin, Jewish Camp Council of Toronto; Jerry and Sandy Genesove, Jews for Judaism; Dr Norman Halpern, JVS Toronto; Geoffrey Matus, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care; Michael Miller, Jewish Family & Child Service; Fay Rotman; Reena and Michal Siskind, Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living.

The awards night, featuring Harvey Atkin as emcee, also recognized Toronto Jewish Arts Council grant recipients for their uniquely creative endeavours. Council grants went to Tobi Asmoucha, Laya Crust, Sarah Lazarovic, Susan Leopold, Davida Nemeroff, Madeleine Pillar (Madi), Dara Samuel, Melissa Shiff, Evan Tapper and Ruth Stern Warzecha.

Toronto prepares for the General Assembly

Numbers tell the story for world's largest Jewish conference

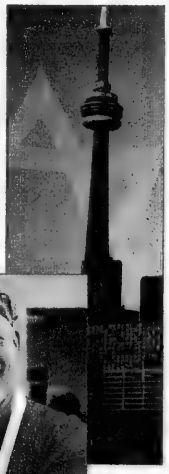
By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Imagine planning a small, intimate gathering for, say about 4,000 guests. Quite the challenge, wouldn't you say?

That's precisely the heady task undertaken by United Jewish Communities and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto as it prepares to host this fall's General Assembly (GA).

UJC represents 189 Jewish Federations and 400 independent communities across North America.

The GA - which runs from November 13 to 15 at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre - is the largest annual Jewish conference in the world, brimming with an exciting choice of top notch speakers, programs and interactive workshops. Speakers include Canadian Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, historian Deborah Lipstadt and writer and television personality, Ben Stein.



More than 7,000 meals are expected to be served at the upcoming General Assembly in Toronto.

With 4,000 participants expected in our fair city from around the world, the task of feeding, housing, entertaining and educating them is far from easy.

Consider, for example, the magnitude of this event and some of the staggering numbers that will make it run.

Organizers expect to serve around 7,000 meals – breakfast, lunch and dinner - over the GA's two-and-a-half days. Of course, where there's food, there must be drinks, and to that end, 9,000 bottles of water are at the ready, as are an estimated 10,500 cups of coffee.

Of course, as ambassadors to our city, we must make sure our guests rest in comfort, so, 1,600 hotel rooms have been blocked off at four GA-designated hotels downtown: the Intercontinental, Fairmont Royal York, Sheraton Centre, and the Renaissance (formerly known as the Skydome hotel).

Eight shuttle buses will transport delegates from their hotels to the convention centre where they will hear over 100 speakers and experience up to 70 events.

One of the highlights of this year's GA is a Global Jewish Marketplace, featuring vendors from Israel and around the world. The marketplace will be open after Shabbat on Saturday, November 12 and throughout the GA, which is chaired by Peter Ekstein, Debbie Kimel and Julia Koschitzky.

To be part of Jewish Toronto history and register for the GA, visit www.GAtoronto.com or call 416.849.1000.

Super Sunday was a ringing success!

Phones were ringing off the hook in homes across the Greater Toronto Area the past week thanks to hundreds of UJA Federation volunteers who dialed for super successful Super Sunday and Super Week telethons.

The telethons - chaired by Mark Satok (pictured) and Helen Silverstein, were the first held in support of Campaign 2006. Donors to the campaign have responded quickly with enthusiasm and compassion to help raise more than $30 million.

Campaign 2006 is focused on assisting Jewish youth at risk around the world.

Israeli team returns from New Orleans

"The damage here is horrible, the worst I've witnessed."

By TAALI LESTER TOLLMAN
UJA Federation

While volunteers from across North America rushed to assist the residents of hurricane ravaged New Orleans, an Israeli team was the only overseas delegation to help out. IsraAid a coordinating body of Israeli and Jewish non-government organizations (NGO) active in relief and humanitarian work, sent a 20 person team, funded in part by UJA Federation to the stricken area. And they were horrified by what they saw.

"The pictures are horrific," said professor Michael Alkan, leader of the medical team for the operation and a senior member of the Faculty of Health Sciences at Ben Gurion University, speaking from Louisiana. "The smell is overwhelming, but what makes it unbearable is the silence in the dead towns. No People, no animals, just police preventing looting."

One of the IsraAid team working in New Orleans.

The delegation, which included physicians, psychologists and experienced search-and-rescue divers, was assigned to St. Bernard Parish and Belle Chase in Louisiana's Plaquemines Parish. However the water was so contaminated, the divers were not allowed to do their regular work so, accompanied by the local sheriff's office, they went door to door into the heavily flooded area of Bernard Parish to trace bodies.

Working directly with the local authorities and without electricity or running water, the medical team led by Alkan, set up a makeshift clinic at a church.

"The damage here was horrible, the worst I've witnessed," said Gal Lusky, head of the mission. "We have seen a lot of death but we have also received huge support from the officials here. They could not believe that with all our troubles in Israel we would take time out to come and help. We were the only overseas team on the ground and we are so proud to represent Israel during this crisis."

The IsraAid team has also served in many other locations including Sri Lanka following last December's tsunami.

Lion of Judah Dinner welcomed 250 guests

Event celebrates women's achievements

By DAVID LEVINE

Lion of Judah (LOJ), a division of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign and Advocacy is a force to be reckoned with, something that was clearly demonstrated at the recent LOJ dinner. Lion of Judah, chaired in Toronto by Linda Waks and Liora Yakubowicz, represents women who donate over five thousand dollars annually to UJA Federation Campaign. The dinner which welcomed over 250 guests to the Royal York Hotel celebrated the achievement, strength and conviction of all those who proudly wear the Lion of Judah pin.

The dinner's keynote speaker, Marie Brenner, a writer for Vanity Fair and author of several books, touched on the role her mother played in her life and how her mother's decision to educate her about the Holocaust led Marie to France, where she investigated the growth of antisemitism across Europe.

Penina Tamano, a young Ethiopian woman, who immigrated to Israel with her family when she was only three years old, passionately retraced the steps of life that took her to Israel and the help she received from the Jewish Agency, UJA Federation's overseas partner, in getting there and integrating into Israeli society.

"We have never met," said Penina Tamano, "but you are responsible for changing my life. Without your work I am not sure where I would be"

Now in law school at Ono Academic College , Tamano dedicated her speech to her mother, and thanked the audience for allowing her to give back to Toronto's Jewish community.

Women's Campaign and Advocacy chair, Linda Frum, tied the evening together by elaborating on a unique two-year pilot program called Ofek L'Bagrut, which provides Ethiopian students with extra tutoring so that they can pass Israeli high school matriculation exams. Additional funds raised by Women's Campaign and Advocacy for UJA Federation Camapgin 2006 will be designated for Ofek L'Bagrut in Kiryat Moshe, a predominantly Ethiopian neighbourhood of Rechovot.

"In Kiryat Moshe," said Frum, "the high school matriculation rate for Ethiopians is a mere 34%, Ethiopian students through Ofek L'Bagrut, were helped to prepare for their high school matriculation exams, with intensive after-school tutoring. This initiative saw miraculous results - a one hundred percent matriculation rate."

The Lion of Judah Dinner was chaired by Andrea Cohen, Lisa Draper and Sandra Waldman.

In His Words — Fresh start for Kishinev

Jewish Toronto begins a new feature on the eloquent statements of our community members on important Jewish issues and events. This week UJA Federation's President, Ted Sokolsky offers his thoughts on the dedication of the new Jewish community centre in Kishinev the capital of Moldova, Europe's poorest country. The centre was built throught the generosity of Stephan Lewar and his gift to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto for this purpose.

The dedication of this wonderful project is a testament to the incredible strength and character of the Jewish community of Kishinev, and the strength and character of the world Jewish partnership, led by the American Jewish joint Distribution Committee (JDC),that has helped make it happen.

For me personally, I would have loved to have been there to see this historical event first hand for a number of reasons:

A view of the centre of Kishenev a once vibrant jewish community.

Firstly, Kishinev was the birthplace of my late father. He was born there in 1924 as my grandparents fled Kiev on their way to Canada to seek a better life for their family. I'm told my grandparents sought refuge and support in the very synagogue which was rededicated as part of the community centre ceremony.

Secondly, I've been very proud to play a part in the revitalization of the infrastructure of our Jewish community in Toronto. We in Toronto have also made it our business to create three new Jewish community Centres (JCC) to help meet needs of a vibrant Jewish community.

I like to think of the Kishinev project as our fourth campus, our fourth JCC.

Thirdly I would love to have been there to personally thank my good friend Judy Amit at the JDC. It was Judy's tremendous patience and guidance, along with that of the JDC's Stuart Saffer, that helped make the Toronto Jewish community's partnership with Kishinev something very real and very important.

Finally, and most importantly, the dedication of the Kishinev JCC fulfills a promise I made to the late Stephan Lewar. Stephan was a Holocaust survivor who came to Jewish philanthropy a little late in life. He was 85 years old when his one and only son Richard passed away. Struck with grief, Stephan and his wife Sophie struggled with how to deal with the tragedy of having to bury their only son.

With no children and no grandchildren, they were lost in a sea of despair. They had survived the Warsaw ghetto together, but somehow this seemed to be a loss they could not survive through again.

In the midst of that despair, Stephan sought me out to figure out how the death of his one son could some how amount to meaning and good in the world. He had made up his mind to disburse his entire fortune to support those less fortunate.

I worked with Stephan on many projects, but the one that most interested him was the work of the chesed centres of the JDC and specifically support for the Jews of Moldova.

He gave me very simple instructions: find me something that helps provide needy Jews with food, clothing, medicine and a sense that they are not alone in the world.

Well Stephan, we found that project in Kishinev, a project of which I know you and Sophie would be very proud had you been able to live to see this day.

I've kept my promise to you…and you have kept your promise to the Jewish people through the strength of your Jewish soul.

May your memory be for a blessing and may that blessing shine on the Jews of Kishinev for years and years to come.

Teen contest winners ponder Anne Frank's message

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Teens Kate Hazell and Sarah Carter missed their first week of school this year.

Instead, they were in Amsterdam as first-prize winners of the annual Ontario-wide Holocaust Arts and Writing Contest sponsored by UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto.

Hazell, 16, who is in Grade 11 at Humberside Collegiate in Toronto, and Carter, a 15-year-old Grade 9 student at Orangeville District Secondary School used an essay and a piece of art, respectively, to answer the contest's question: "What would Anne Frank tell us if she were alive today?"

Hazell's interest in Frank – the young teenage diarist who perished in the Holocaust after spending two years in hiding in Amsterdam – was sparked on a school field trip last year to see an exhibit of photographs taken by Otto Frank, Anne's father.

"It was very moving," she said, adding that a child survivor of the Holocaust also spoke to their class as part of the outing. "That definitely motivated me to act in any way I could."

She said it had always been in the back of her mind to read Anne's diary "because it's so important," but she didn't actually pick it up until she began thinking about entering the contest.

"Reading the first couple of pages actually brought me to tears," she said. "She's built up as such a strong character, and she is, but you realize [also] that she's just a kid."

Even after her visit to Amsterdam – where the two girls, chaperoned by Holocaust Centre volunteer and Holocaust Education Week co-chair Joan Shapero, visited the Dutch Resistance Museum and took a VIP tour of the Anne Frank House – Hazell says she finds it hard to grasp the number of people killed during the Holocaust.

"But when you see it in terms of individual experiences, it's the only way to really try and understand.

"I think there's only so much you can study in a classroom and out of a textbook about World War II and the Holocaust," she said. "Going to Amsterdam and visiting the streets where these things went on really affected me in a different way."

Hazell's contest entry consisted of a sketch she made of Anne that was scanned and transferred to stainless steel, so that the viewer is reflected in her face when he or she looks at the piece. It also incorporates a quote from Anne: "Nobody need wait a moment before starting to improve the world."

Carter read Anne Frank's diary last year at the suggestion of her English teacher, who also told his students about the contest. The project appealed to her interest in both English and history.

At first, Carter admitted, she was "not really into" the book. But once she persisted and sat down to read the entire volume in a day, she found it inspiring, she said.

She found it "emotional" to visit the Anne Frank house. "I felt really close to Anne."

In her essay, she wrote that she believes Anne would be disappointed to see that hate still exists in our world. Her diary "lives on as a reminder to us of those who died in the Holocaust, and to see the good in all people and in ourselves," she wrote.

The teens were "real troupers," said Shapero, noting their long days learning and seeing the sights, including – on a lighter note – the flower market, Amsterdam's Botanical Garden and the Heineken brewery.

Rabbinic Reflections

As far as religions go, Judaism is strange, and upon reflection, one has to wonder whether it qualifies as a religion at all.

Consider that you will not find one reference in the entire Bible to heaven, paradise or the afterlife, nor will you find any exhortation to be spiritual.

What kind of religion ignores the two most fundamental elements of religiosity?

Ask any religious person what motivates him or her. Invariably, in language and imagery that differs only in form but not in content, the answer will be that the reason for living a spiritual life is in order to receive God's reward and avoid His punishment. The underlying premise of all the world's religions is that God, being perfect, lacks for nothing, and religious observance is for the benefit of man. Not surprisingly, the notion of heaven and hell dominates religious literature.

This belief leads to, among other conclusions, the following: If religion is about me and my reward, then this has to result in a life that is self-oriented, albeit in the spiritual sense. Moreover, anyone who does not share my belief stands in my way and must come on board (convert) or be eliminated. So, if I take my religion seriously, you'd better watch out.

Yet, if life is about reaching paradise, nirvana or whatever, then what if someone doesn't make it? The inescapable conclusion is: so what? Nothing is lost or missing if someone fails to get to heaven. Truth has not been compromised. God hasn't been affected. Life is dispensable. Either you get there or you don't.

Along comes Judaism with a revolutionary message. In a way, it's ironic, because most of the world's religions are rooted in Judaism to begin with. Clearly, something got lost in the translation.

What is our message? It's deceptively simple. God needs us. He needs every single human being to carry out His purpose in creation. Every human being is indispensable to His plan. Every human being is infinitely valuable.

But if God is perfect and infinite, then how can He have a need? The answer is that God is beyond perfection. God is beyond "infinite," because even "infinite" has its drawback. The drawback is that everything else has no value, nothing to contribute, no bearing upon, no relationship with, and no effect upon the infinite. In the realm of the infinite all else has no significance. Nothing else exists.

But God is beyond infinite. God can be and chooses to be affected by us mortal, finite human beings. He has chosen to have a need. God tells us in His Torah that He created the world and entrusted us with the mission of perfecting it, making it the kind of place that He wants it to be. That is why He gave us His commandments. God is saying to us: Please do Me this favour, keep My mitzvot (the word "mitzvah" means commandment) so that you fulfill the purpose for which I created the world in the first place.

What is His purpose? God desires that we make this world a welcome place for Him – a place where He can be at home. God wants a relationship with human beings in this world. To that end, He gave us His commandments. His mitzvot are to be performed with, and in, the physical world, thereby sanctifying it, so that the world will one day experience the revelation of His presence.

So when someone comes along and says, "I don't need to perform this or that mitzvah," they miss the point entirely. They may not need it. They may be a perfectly good, nice and spiritual person without it. But God needs it. It's His world. We are guests – welcomed, invited, but guests. When we do what He asks of us, we're not being religious, we're being decent.

Ringing in the Jewish New Year

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The modern Christian thinker Reinhold Niehbuhr once noted that "there is nothing more irrelevant than an answer to a question that no one has asked."

The first goal of Torah education, then, is to identify the real concerns of the people who turn to religion for inspiration, knowledge and enlightenment. Simply providing information that is of little use to our students but satisfies our own illusions that we have "done our job" only delays the task of locating the gaps that require filling. There are many Jews who would relate to Judaism if we offered them a dialogue that actually addresses their questions, not the ones we would like them to have or the ones we are comfortable in answering.

The High Holy Days can only be seen as a great gift from God that we are at risk of tossing away in a flurry of ritualistic fastidiousness. While Jews pile into synagogues large and small, traditional and newfangled, the essential issue of whether we truly understand the massive spur to self-examination that is encoded deep within the liturgy, and the problem of how to best employ the visceral symbolism of blowing a horn to save one's life, remain open and disturbing questions.

The assumption that even observant Jews have thoughtfully pondered why they are serving God – that is, asking themselves what is the utility of mitzvot, what is the Jewish mission in the world, and how does Jewish ethnicity relate to the uniqueness of other peoples and faiths? – can no longer be taken for granted.

The time has come to recognize that all prayer services in contemporary Judaism, of every denominational stripe, must be learning experiences. All Jews, from unaffiliated to haredi, need to know more about why they are saying what they are reading. All Jews must be granted the gift of consciousness at the moment that they are praying – as opposed to long afterward or not at all.

A remarkably telling story is offered by Allan Lew in his insightful new book Be Still and Get Going, an examination of how meditation can aid in Jewish spiritual practice (something revolutionized decades ago by Rabbi Aryeh Kaplan of blessed memory). Lew cites an experiment carried out at Princeton University in the 1960s. Three separate groups of people were hooked up to devices that measure galvanic skin response (meaning a change in the skin's ability to conduct electricity that is caused by an emotional stimulus). The first was a group of ordinary Americans, the second a number of Siddha Yoga adherents, and the third a group of Zen masters practising mindful meditation. A bell was then rung every 15 to 30 seconds.

The ordinary Americans measured a strong response at first, but it radically diminished the longer the bell rang and they became habituated to its sound. The yoga practitioners did not respond at all, from the first bell to the last (they were never "present" in a profound sense). But the Zen masters measured maximum response each time – "complete shock," as Lew puts it, "with every ringing of the bell." Their mindfulness made each moment a new one, each breath of life a fresh experience filled with wonder, possibility and surprise.

As our lives pass and our ability to live in the moment becomes dulled, our goal in religious education, especially on Rosh Hashanah, is none other than the ringing of the bell, the internal shofar meant to ignite the sleeping, but ready to awaken, soul.

Jewish Life

Rosh Hashanah 2005

Books
Bernard Baskin

Rosh Hashanah this year occurs in the shadow of Hurricane Katrina. Harrowing images of that calamity remind us of our vulnerability. They emphasize that our existence is always in danger. Our health is exposed to hazard. Every possession we have can be lost.

The poetic liturgy of the day takes on new meaning: "Each of us is like a shattered urn, grass that must wither, a flower that must fade, a shadow moving on, a cloud passing by, a particle of dust floating on the wind, a dream soon forgotten."

Rosh Hashanah summons us to render an annual accounting of our lives. It challenges us: how loving is our relationship with our spouse and children? How do we get on with our friends, neighbours and employees?

Civilization, it has been said, is just a slow process in learning to be kind. People who have not learned this lesson remain uneducated regardless of the number of diplomas on their office walls or the number of degrees that follow their signature. People who have learned to be kind have mastered the most vital subject in life's curriculum. Their formal schooling may have been meagre, their familiarity with books not very intimate. But if they have learned how to bring a ray of light where there is darkness, a work of cheer where spirits have been crushed by circumstances – those people are civilized.

An automobile often needs a wheel alignment to keep it going in the right direction. The steering mechanism goes out of line through constant use, and the car begins to wobble. Just as often a human being begins to wobble morally and needs a new direction and sharper reading of the signs on the road of life.

Why is it that we need our guidance system corrected? Some of us are too far-sighted, and we neglect to see those near and dear unto us. Some of us are too near-sighted, concentrating on ourselves alone and ignoring those who are distant from us. We must make sure that the entire community is included in the range of our vision.

The decisive question that each person must ask can be stated in the simplest terms: "Am I related to something infinite or am I not?" This query is the most demanding one that we can ever make. It pierces to the very heart of our human situation. If we assume that our life is related to the infinite, we don't fix our concern upon the futile and transitory. We don't content ourselves and our souls with the attainment of goals that are of no real significance. Our lives assume a more expansive character.

Finally, Rosh Hashanah brings hope and spiritual renewal. When people ask me, "Where is God?" I tell them that I would rather rephrase the question to, "When is God?" Asking where He is implies that God is an object located in a specific place, and if we could just find the right place, we would find God.

Asking "When is God?" gives us the idea that God can be anywhere, if the right things are happening. When men and women are affectionate, brave, caring, truthful and charitable, God is present. He is not in the place; He is in the moment.

The philosopher Martin Buber when asked, "Where is God found?" would reply that when people act toward each other in a truly human fashion, God fills in the empty space between them. Like an electric arc between poles, God is not so much in either person as He is in the relationship that connects one to the other.

In the new year, fate is what we are given. Destiny is what we make of what is given to us – and in that choice lies all the difference

Rosh Hashanah music

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Pesach has Dayeinu. Chanukah has Maoz Tzur. But what songs are associated with Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur? Actually, the Days of Awe have some of the most inspiring melodies found in Jewish liturgy, and one tune even gained fame in popular culture. As we approach the High Holy Days, you can now preview their melodies.

Let's start with the best music page I've come across in years. Hosted by Israel National News (aka Arutz Sheva), this page has links to hours of all kind of Israeli and Jewish music. For Rosh Hashanah alone, there are dozens of chassidic, Israeli and Mizrachi tunes. Aside from that, there's music for practically all the chagim, as well as Naomi Shemer and Shlomo Carlebach tunes. [www.inn.co.il/hebrew/radio/jukebox/juke.htm]

A couple of notes: this page is in Hebrew but even if you only have a basic grasp of the language, you should be fine. And if your browser has a difficult time displaying Hebrew characters, try downloading the free Firefox browser, which usually does a fine job of displaying Hebrew letters with minimal fuss. [www.mozilla.org/products/firefox/all]

The most famous poem associated with the High Holy Days must be Unetaneh Tokef. "On Rosh Hashanah will be inscribed and on Yom Kippur will be sealed how many will pass from the earth and how many will be created; who will live and who will die." The poem is attributed to Rabbi Amnon who lived in Mainz, Germany, about 1,000 years ago and met a tragic end when he refused to convert to Christianity. [www.ou.org/chagim/roshhashannah/unetaneh.html]

A version of Unetaneh Tokef entered popular culture in 1974 when Leonard Cohen released Who by Fire. "And who by brave assent, who by accident, who in solitude, who in this mirror… and who shall I say is calling?" Cohen explained that he derived his song "from the melody which I heard when I was sat in a synagogue. And of course the ending of my song is something different. Who shall I say is calling? This is my kind of prayer: who is it, or what is it which determines man's life?" [www.medialab.chalmers.se/gutar/who. by.fire.html]

One of the most distinctive types of poetry associated with Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur is the piyut. As Eliezer Segal explains, "The complexity and erudition of classical piyut is utterly astounding," but in the hands of masters like the renowned Yannai, the result is "poetic magic." [http://tinyurl.com/a4sby] I came across a wonderful Hebrew site with Rosh Hashanah piyutim from around the world – Yemen, Turkey, Iraq and Amsterdam – each one sung with a traditional tune. [http://tinyurl.com/9ey7n]

In his essay Music from Beyond, Rabbi Yaakov Asher Sinclair describes the strong bond between music, the concept of judgment (key to Rosh Hashanah) and the kabbalistic theory of tzimtzum, the mystical constriction that was needed for God to create the world. You'll find that a link to that essay plus another music-related one by Rabbi Sinclair, That Will Bring Us Back to Doe, at the Ohr Somayach site. [http://tinyurl.com/dsdd3]

Most Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur music is quite solemn. For something a bit different – and very lively – listen to Uman, Uman, Rosh Hashanah. [http://tinyurl.com/b7drs] Uman, Ukraine, is the resting place of Rabbi Nachman of Breslov (1772-1810). Every year, thousands of Breslover Chassidim from around the world make the pilgrimage to Uman to honour and celebrate their rebbe. You can listen to a joyous excerpt from their album online. The same page also has links to Breslover renditions of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur prayers that date back to the time of the Baal Shem Tov in the 18th century. [www.breslov.com/music/]

And for something much more recent yet appropriate for the season, you can print out the lyrics and listen to excerpts from popular songs like Hineh Shanah Overet (A Year Has Passed) and, of course, the perennial favourite Bashanah Haba'ah. [www.hebrewsongs.com/roshhashanasongs.htm]

Hands-on teacher really digs the environment

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Ellen Kessler readily admits to having dirt under her fingernails.

But she has a good reason.

As the Toronto Heschel School's environmental co-ordinator, she floats between different classrooms and the school's outdoor garden, teaching students in a very hands-on way about gardening, recycling and the environment.

On a warm, sunny day earlier this month, after arriving at the school's elementary campus at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue in her black pick-up truck – a 50th birthday present from her husband – Kessler spent about an hour in Heschel's teaching garden talking about her work – and pointing out plants such as tomatoes, pumpkin, and wildflowers "that attract butterflies where we wouldn't otherwise have life."

At the same time, she provided informal lessons to individual students on an ad hoc basis while they played outside.

Sporting a stained hat, T-shirt, casual pants and worn gold-coloured sneakers, Kessler, 55, looked more like an enthusiastic camp counsellor than a typical teacher.

Kessler, one of Heschel's five founders, has an "unbelievable combination of understanding children, the environment and the whole sense of awe and wonder we're trying to develop through [Rabbi Abraham Joshua] Heschel's vision," said school principal Gail Baker.

The school, now in its 10th year, has a very strong environmental ethos that's expressed everywhere from its curriculum to its composting program, Baker added.

In the teaching garden, Kessler uses a drip irrigation system to teach about agriculture and water issues in Israel, and she points out the differences between yellow jacket wasps and bees that make honey used to celebrate Rosh Hashanah.

> A lesson from the teacher: "Take your children outside. Teach them to observe the Creation with awe and wonder. Inspire them to learn the lessons of nature's perfect system and to be active to guard and protect it."

"I want children to understand where food comes from," she said. "None of these kids leaves Heschel without knowing how to make something grow."

Last year, she said, it "made my heart sing" to learn that a nine-year-old boy had prepared an outdoor garden at home after learning how to at school.

Another high point for her was meeting environmentalist David Suzuki this past May, when the school's elementary division was one of five runners-up in Canadian Geographic's national Green Team Challenge. Kessler and the school have also been honoured by the Jewish National Fund for environmental learning.

Kessler, a former advertising copywriter, learned her love of nature from her parents, she said, but it wasn't until she had children of her own that she decided she wanted to teach.

Ellen Kessler, environmental co-ordinator at the Toronto Heschel School, transported these plants to school in her pick-up truck. Plants clean the air, she notes.
[Frances Kraft photo]

After years of volunteering and teaching in classrooms, she went back to school at age 48 to get her teaching credentials, a bachelor of education from York University.

"You realize there's such potential in kids."

It's how you get there that makes the difference.

FAST launches school anti-racism initiative

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A coalition of non-Jewish business and community leaders formed earlier this year by Elizabeth Comper and her husband Tony Comper, president and CEO of BMO Financial Group, to fight anti-Semitism and racism has launched its first educational initiative.

Choose Your Voice, a project of FAST (Fighting Anti-Semitism Together), made its debut Sept. 19 at Lord Lansdowne Public School to an audience that included local educators and grades 6, 7 and 8 students, at whom the program is aimed.

The event included a preview of the Choose Your Voice DVD, introduced by Ben Mulroney, host of Canadian Idol, and featuring survivors of the Holocaust, the Rwandan genocide, and students from Montreal's United Talmud Torah, which was firebombed last year. Elizabeth Moore, a former hate group member, and Herb Carnegie, the 85-year-old former pro hockey player who was denied entry into the NHL because he is black, also appear in the DVD and were present at the launch.

Sheila Ward, chair of the Toronto District School Board, said that it is not easy, but necessary, to speak out against hatred.

"There are many diseases in the world today that strike fear in all our hearts, but [none] comes close to killing as many people as the diseases of hatred and its cousin bigotry," Ward said. "Hatred killed six million in the Holocaust, almost a million in Rwanda, a million and a half Armenians between 1916 and 1923, and in Cambodia between 1975 and 1979, about 1.75 million." Canada is not immune to the damage that hatred does, she added.

In fact, Elizabeth Comper, a former elementary school teacher, was galvanized into founding FAST by reports that 2004 was the worst year in more than half a century for anti-Jewish activity in Canada, with 857 reported incidents of harassment, violence and vandalism.

"We felt we had to do something," she said. "We believe that no Canadian children should ever have to feel afraid to be who they are. Nor should they have to worry whether anyone out there really cares."

She urged the audience to lobby local school officials to get the program into schools across Canada. The project, which was developed in partnership with Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, is being distributed to Ontario schools this fall.

Plans are in the works to launch the program in both French and English in Quebec in 2006, said Tony Comper.

"Choose Your Voice reminds us to learn from the past, be aware of what is happening to date around us and stand tall in the face of any bigotry, prejudice or intolerance," said Elana Aleinikov, principal of the multicultural downtown school that dates back to 1888.

The DVD, with accompanying lesson guides, meets Ontario curriculum requirements, said Elizabeth Comper. It is divided into four parts that deal with stereotyping; racism and anti-Semitism in Canada's past; more recent incidents; and strategies for responding to prejudice.

From left, Elizabeth Comper, Elana Aleinikov, Sheila Ward and Tony Comper display learning materials for FAST's new anti-racism program.

Canadians need to address unity issue, Rae says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Canadians should not define themselves through their language, their race or their religion, said former Ontario premier Bob Rae at the opening general meeting of National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section, last week.

"They should define themselves as a group of people who came together to do great things in the past, and aspire to do great things in the future."

A major concern, he said, should be that of the country's unity. "If we lose sight of that, we lose sight of the country. I am concerned because I am seeing signs that we are not paying enough attention to the question of unity.

"We could be facing a referendum in two or three years, and we have the job of making a case in Quebec to stand up for Canada.

"Quebec will never be better off than it is [within] Canada, and we would not be either. We are too connected. To pull us apart would tear the fabric of the country."

He said, however, that he does not see leaders bringing up this question. He was shocked, especially during the French debate in the last election campaign, to see that no one challenged the leader of the separatist Bloc Québécois, he added.

"Not once did anyone go on the offensive for Canada. [Pierre] Trudeau and [Jean] Chrétien would have done so."

Bob Rae addressed the opening meeting of National Council of Jewish Women. [Carolyn Blackman photo]

The key objectives of government are to ensure that we are prosperous, and to watch out for our neighbours, he said.

"It's not enough for people to do well; they need to see how their neighbours are doing. This is the balance that needs to be struck in government. We have to make sure that society is socially just. The system isn't perfect, but we can't leave anyone out."

When he saw the events unfold in New Orleans, he said, he learned a lesson. "We can't build a society where we leave people behind. Imagine an evacuation plan that leaves out residents of hospitals and nursing homes.

"We are an immigrant society, and we have to make sure there is room at the table for everyone."

Being a leader is never easy, he said, and sometimes leaders can be very unpopular. "If they say things that people don't want to hear, they could be out.

"People need to reflect on the importance of leadership. It sometimes means telling them what they don't want to hear and having the courage to see it through."

Canada is in for some tough times in the next five to 10 years, he said, "and I hope Canadians give their leaders the slack and support they are going to need.

"Leaders need the courage and direction [to promote] equalization and make sure that no one province falls behind. A little bit needs to be shared."

Canadians need to understand the history and tradition of their country, he said. "We have made the mistake of hiding our light under a bushel for too long. I would like to see us reinforce [the idea] that Canadian values have meaning."

With regard to the funding of religious schools, he said, "my view is that [Canada is a multicultural country] and public schools are the key place to learn about other people. That is a critical notion.

"One of our challenges is to live next door to someone different and share their values. If we don't do this in school, [that notion] will be delayed.

"If we denigrate public institutions, we [are saying that those values are not important] and we will have less in the end."

Palestinians must take next step in peace process: Israeli official

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The next phase in the peace process depends on the Palestinians, according to the deputy legal adviser of Israel's ministry of foreign affairs.

If the Palestinian leadership can impose stability in the Gaza Strip, vacated by Israel recently after a 38-year occupation, both sides can resume negotiations, said Daniel Taub.

In an interview at the Israeli Consulate last week, Taub listed two major steps the Palestinian Authority must take to bolster Israel's confidence in its ability to rule 1.3 million Palestinians in Gaza.

The PA should assert its power, not tolerating challenges to its authority by various militias, and should treat "terrorist groups as a problem rather than as a partner."

"We want to see Gaza flourish as a model of Palestinian governance," said Taub, a 43-year-old official who was born in London, England, and who was here to deliver lectures on the current situation at Canadian universities. "Then we can use this as an incentive to getting back to the negotiating table."

Once Israel and the PA are talking again, Taub noted, they can try to resolve the loose ends relating to Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza – the status of border crossings between Israel and Gaza and Gaza and Egypt, the construction of a Palestinian seaport and the reopening of a Palestinian airport.

For the moment, he observed, Israel has gone as far as it can go.

Israel has pulled civilians and soldiers out of Gaza, dismantled the military government and placed Egypt in charge of patrolling the Philadelphi route between Gaza and Egypt.

But these steps must be followed up by a credible Palestinian campaign to fight terrorism and build institutions and an accountable government.

Complaints by Palestinian officials that Israel's occupation has not ended by virtue of its control of Gaza's border crossings, air space and territorial waters are being circulated by Palestinians opposed to PA President's Mahmoud Abbas, Taub claimed.

"I don't understand how Palestinians can say Gaza is still a 'big prison.'"

Taub, however, expressed satisfaction with Abbas' description of Israel's withdrawal from Gaza as a significant development.

The Israeli cabinet's decision not to raze empty synagogues in Gaza was one of the most sensitive and painful it was forced to take, Taub said.

It was predicated on the hope that Palestinians would respect the sanctity of the shuls. After Israel's pullout, several synagogues were desecrated and burned by mobs.

Taub explained that the cabinet left the synagogues standing after a public outcry and in the wake of rabbinical rulings that Jews should not dismantle them.

Turning to a related topic, Taub said that Israel is committed to dismantling outposts in the West Bank built without government authorization.

"It's a complicated legal issue, but Israel has undertaken to address it in the first phase of the road map."

The road map, sponsored by the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations, expects reciprocal steps from both sides and foresees a two-state solution.

But before Israel dismantles the outposts, the Palestinians must deal effectively with the infrastructure of terrorism, Taub declared.

Commenting on Israel's yet-to-be completed barrier in and along the West Bank, Taub said it is a temporary measure designed to combat terrorism.

"There is no reason why this fence could not be removed in the future."

It is being built for security, not political, reasons, he insisted.

Asked why its route does not run parallel to the old Green Line separating Israel from the West Bank, Taub cited security and topographical concerns.

He described as "remarkable" a recent Israeli Supreme Court verdict rejecting a 2004 World Court ruling that the barrier is illegal and should be torn down. In the same judgment, Israel's High Court ruled that the barrier should be re-routed to reduce Palestinian hardship.

Asked about an incident in Britain earlier this month in which a retired Israeli general was unable to disembark from an El Al plane due to complaints lodged against him by human rights groups, Taub replied that some Israeli and overseas organizations are making "political capital" out of the issue.

"But we're committed to the rule of law," he added. Israeli army officers who commit criminal offences have been and will be brought to justice.

As he put it, "We've put on trial officers who have mistreated Palestinian civilians or were found looting."

Baycrest nurses help New Orleans colleagues

When the Registered Nursing Association of Ontario (RNAO) put out the call to its nurses to start collection drives for their colleagues in flood-ravaged New Orleans, the nurses at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care came through in a big way.

The response was enormous, said Penney Minor, the Baycrest nurse who organized the drive, which collected 50 large boxes of clothing, toiletries, scrubs and medical supplies to send down.

"In disasters like Hurricane Katrina, we sometimes forget the other victim of this flooding – the medical caregivers," Minor said.

"Nurses in Louisiana also lost their homes and all their possessions. They've been so busy helping all the other flood victims that they haven't had much time to worry about their own losses. They are true heroes and they are also very exhausted."

When Minor called the Louisiana Nurses Association to ask what items they needed most, she soon realized the enormity of the tragedy and that there was a need for the bare essentials of survival.

"The association was surprised to hear from us in Canada and expressed sincere gratitude," she said. "What they really needed were very basic things like socks. That's when I realized that they had lost everything in the floods except the clothes on their back."

In a little more than a week, Baycrest nurses collected enough supplies to fill the 50 boxes.

"We were even contemplating driving everything down ourselves in a truck, we were so anxious to help out," Minor said, adding that the boxes were shipped through arrangements made by the RNAO.

The Baycrest nurses also penned letters of support and inspiration to their American colleagues and tucked them in each box.

Baycrest nurses, from left, Jan Anderson, Laura Molloy, Cyndi Pirs and Penney Minor help pack boxes with clothing, toiletries and medical supplies to send to nurses in New Orleans.

One note said: "Our thoughts and prayers are with you during this difficult time… be strong, be brave… continue your courageous work. You all have made us proud to be nurses."

RNAO president Joan Lesmond dropped by Baycrest to offer her personal thanks to the nurses. She also handwrote a letter to include in the boxes.

"We are only apart in distance," it read. "Please know that we are here for you… keep up the faith and spirit."

Lesmond said she hopes nurses at hospitals across Ontario will follow Baycrest's lead and organize similar drives for colleagues in the flood-damaged states.

Wiesenthal 'was the voice of those who perished'

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Center's Canadian office, said Wiesenthal displayed "incredible self-sacrifice, such a dedication and such a need to ensure that the voices of the six million… would continue to be heard."

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, met Wiesenthal in his Vienna office in the mid-1980s.

At the time,"he was the voice of those who perished," Farber said.

Although an architect by training, Wiesenthal set aside his profession and chose instead to devote his life to hunting Nazis. Farber said Wiesenthal told him he did so because, "'When I go to heaven and [meet] my [Jewish] brothers and sisters, I want to say 'I was your voice.'

"His was a lonely battle."

In the immediate postwar era, Wiesenthal worked for the war crimes section of the U.S. Army, preparing evidence of Nazi atrocities, but Cold War politics led the United States to shift its attention to containing the Soviet Union and developing good relations with West Germany.

In 1947, Wiesenthal and 30 volunteers opened the Jewish Historical Documentation Center in Linz, Austria, but that office closed in 1954. The centre's files were transferred to Yad Vashem's archives in Israel.

Simon Wiesenthal

Wiesenthal retained his file on Eichmann, one of the chief architects of the Nazis' Final Solution. Wiesenthal received word Eichmann was living in Argentina and passed that information to Israeli authorities. That led to his capture, trial and eventual execution in 1961.

Following Eichmann's capture, Wiesenthal reopened the Jewish Documentation Center in Vienna. One of his high-profile successes was tracking down Karl Silberbauer, the Gestapo officer who arrested famed diarist Anne Frank in Amsterdam – a rebuke to Holocaust-deniers who claimed the Anne Frank diary was a fake.

In the mid-1960s, Wiesenthal helped track down nine SS officers who were later put on trial in Stuttgart for their role in the murder of Jews in Lvov, Ukraine. And a few years later, he helped track down Stangl.

Given his successes and his high profile, his modest Viennese office was often a shock to visitors. It is simple, sparsely furnished and overflowing with books, documents and dossiers. One story about the office suggests the tenants below were concerned the floor might buckle under the intense weight of the materials.

Adler said people mistakenly believed Wiesenthal ran a modern high-tech operation. Instead he painstakingly took handwritten notes and recorded information on two-by-four cards. "It was literally a one-person show," Adler said.

Farber said Wiesenthal's office equipment consisted of a typewriter and a secretary. But "he was a genius in collecting information… And he lit the fire in the belly of governments."

When Farber met Wiesenthal, the Nazi hunter was 76, but still full of energy and passion. "He told me, he really did it for the children. People forget that 1½ million children under 10 were killed, and they had no voice but him."

During the Holocaust, 89 members of Wiesenthal's family and his wife's family were killed by the Nazis.

In 1941, when he was working as an architect in Lvov, now part of Ukraine, he narrowly escaped execution. Detained in the Janwska concentration camp nearby, he was assigned to forced labour.

In 1944, with Soviet forces approaching, he and other prisoners were forced to march west, ending in Mauthausen in Austria. He weighed less than 100 pounds and was liberated on May 5, 1945, by American forces.

Adler said the Simon Wiesenthal Center was established almost 30 years ago and was named for the famed Nazi hunter because his name "became synonymous with those seeking justice, not just for the Holocaust [victims] but he was also outspoken for Armenians and later for Rwanda and Bosnia. I can't think of a better name for our organization and our goals, which are to emulate him."

Marathon enthusiast Vinegar runs for Israel

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When most people run for a charitable cause, it's typically to raise funds for medical research.

But for marathon enthusiast Alan Vinegar, the cause is actually a country.

"Since I wanted to do something charitable for Israel, [why not combine it with]...my passion for running."

On Oct. 16, Vinegar, 48, will run in the Toronto Marathon as a representative of Running for Israel, an initiative that involves fundraising for charities that support Israel by taking part in an established marathon.

"Every donation brings us a stride closer to living the reality of a peaceful Israel," trumpets the Running for Israel Web site.

Although there are probably less than 50 people participating in the endeavour, they span the globe, running marathons in such cities as Miami, Los Angeles, Berlin and Tiberias.

Vinegar, a dentist by trade, has been diligently canvassing clients, colleagues, family and friends for donations. He's up to about $1,000, aiming to raise $1,800.

"I tend to be approaching Jewish people to support this, but some of the [dental] specialists I refer to are quite happy to provide support and they're not Jewish," Vinegar relates.

"They like the fact the charities are humanitarian."

Proceeds raised by Running For Israel will go towards Hasbara Fellowships, which supports university seminars to counter anti-Israel bias; OneFamily, an organization providing assistance to victims of terrorism in Israel; Keren Y & Y, which helps needy families in Israel; and Honest Reporting, a media watch group that scrutinizes press coverage of Israel.

A runner for the last 15 years and also a triathlete, Vinegar says living a healthy lifestyle is what propels him to push himself on the road for miles and miles.

"It's a feeling of well being, a healthy pursuit," says the father of two.

"It lends itself to a balanced life and I get some time [for] personal reflection."

Collectively, he's completed seven marathons, including the world renowned Boston Marathon.

Next year, he plans on being a member of the largest Running for Israel contingent at the New York Marathon.

Vinegar's training regimen involves running three or four times a week, along with swimming and biking.

"I've been preparing for (the Toronto Marathon) since early August," he notes.

"I tend not to run while listening to music. I just find time for myself."

As for Running for Israel, Vinegar says it comes straight from the heart.

"[This] adds tremendous value to the whole experience," he says.

Danforth Jewish Circle welcomes new spiritual leader

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

You could say the match between the Danforth Jewish Circle (DJC) and its new spiritual leader was bashert.

Here was a liberal congregation searching for a rabbi who would appreciate the multi-faith spectrum of its membership, while in Los Angeles, a fourth-year rabbinical student was dreaming of leading a progressive community in downtown Toronto.

When the congregation ended its search, the rabbinical student, Eliza Kukla, was named the 10-year-old DJC's first spiritual leader.

Kukla, 30, who was born in British Columbia, did her schooling in Toronto, including her undergraduate degree. She went on to become a rabbinical student at Hebrew Union College in Los Angeles with the hope of finding a pulpit in the city where she spent her formative years.

"I wanted to be back in Toronto," Kukla told The CJN in a recent interview. "Downtown Toronto is an underserved Jewish area, especially those communities that are interfaith and gay and lesbian – communities that don't fit into the mainstream."

While visiting Toronto last December, she heard through friends about the DJC's search for a part-time rabbi. It was a perfect match, and Kukla, who will be ordained next May, was selected to lead the east-end congregation.

"It's a delight to work with a community that already has such a powerful sense of grassroots ownership in building their community," she said. "It's such a participatory group, with members offering so much in spiritual and community leadership to each other."

Kukla will be completing her final year of studies in New York, a more convenient base than Los Angeles for her monthly visits to the DJC, which has about 100 member families and holds services at Eastminster United Church on Danforth Avenue.

Eliza Kukla is the new spiritual leader of the Danforth Jewish Circle.
[Barbara Silverstein photo]

When in town, Kukla will lead the community in Shabbat services, Torah study and other community events, and she will be available for life-cycle celebrations.

Kukla will also be officiating at the DJC's High Holy Day services, which draw some 500 people annually.

She said she has plans to help the community get more involved in social justice projects.

As well, she will focus on providing learning opportunities, particularly in text study.

"It was text study and the sense of community that made me fall in love with Judaism, which is why I wanted to create entry ways for others," she said.

"I know how hard it was to connect to a Jewish community. I want to create portals in Judaism for others."

Kukla grew up in a secular home, but her family was "culturally Jewish," she explained.

Her father André Kukla, a Holocaust survivor, was born in Belgium and spent the war years as a hidden child. She grew up with many stories about the war told to her by her Latvian step-grandfather. "He had amazing stories. I always felt connected to him."

Her grandparents immigrated to the United States after the war and settled in Los Angeles, where they had a second child.

Her father is a psychology professor who moved to Canada in 1970 and eventually taught in Toronto. Both her sister and brother-in-law are philosophy professors.

"There's a lot of philosophy in the family, "she laughed. "I like to say that I do applied philosophy."

Kukla ended up developing a connection to Jewish prayer and observance on her own, when she was an undergraduate student at the University of Toronto.

She went on to major in Jewish studies and studio art. After graduating, she spent time in Israel, living on a kibbutz and studying Judaism in Jerusalem. Upon her return to Toronto, she wore a number of hats: she was a freelance writer as well as an assistant to the artistic director of the Ashkenaz Yiddish festival, and she started teaching bar and bat mitzvah students and adult Jewish education courses.

The adult education grew naturally out of her involvement with Ashkenaz, Kukla said.

"People started asking me if I would become a rabbi."

For the last two years, she has been the spiritual leader of a small shul in Lubbock, Texas, a 93-family congregation that has a membership that ranges from atheist to Orthodox.

"It was the only synagogue within a 300-mile radius. It was the only option. I loved it. It was great training to work in such a diverse community.

"I was the only rabbi. I did everything There was such a need for a rabbinical presence in the region."

With the High Holy Days approaching, Kukla said she is eager to help connect her congregants to the DJC.

"I'm committed to welcoming interfaith families into the community and finding meaningful ways for non-Jews to participate.

"We will be a welcoming space."

Chicago 58 leaves Kensington Market area

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Sid Starkman, 80, left the country so he would not have to witness his 84-year-old family-owned business leave the Kensington Market area.

He worked at Chicago 58, a food products company started by his father-in-law David Bernholtz, for 60 years, "and I just didn't want to watch when they packed up. I'm too tied up with the place."

He acknowledged, however, that the company should have moved from 58 Lippincott St. – they have since relocated to Woodbridge – 40 years ago. "We grew up here and we're comfortable, but we can't add on anymore. We've done all we can.

"I'm sad," he says with a sigh. "We're one of the last Jewish-owned businesses in the area. An era is done," says Starkman, who was born on Oxford Street, on the fringes of the market.

Starkman is still president, but the company is now run by Ted Bernholtz, David's grandson, and Moshe Ami, Starkman's son-in-law. Harold Bernholtz, Ted's father, who also worked for the company, helped out "to get them through the move."

Harold Bernholtz, 73, who "officially retired" four years ago, says his father, born in Czenstochov, Poland, started the business with partner Harry Garalick on Parliament Street in 1920. "Two years later, we moved here – there was a tinsmith shop in its place – and that was it.

"At that time, the refrigerator was a box of ice and the floor was covered with sawdust. We're computerized now, but our equipment is from decades ago."

In 1947, Starkman joined the company, and in 1949 his father bought out his partner, says Bernholtz. "Another son-in-law, Max Reiken, joined in 1951, and I came in 1960. That's our history; it has [almost] always been us."

Until about the 1950s all their neighbours were Jewish, "but gradually they all moved away. Now it's Chinese, Portuguese, Italian – a mixed bag. I don't remember any anti-Semitism, though. Everyone accepted everyone else."

Sid Starkman in front of Chicago 58's old headquarters in Kensington Market.

His father, who died in 1966, was attached to the area, says Bernholtz, "but he was a realistic person. He did what he had to do. He would understand the reasons for our move. I was born on Euclid Street and I was brought up in the store, but we have to be practical.

"This is a piece of real estate that has outlived its purpose. We can't remain competitive here. We were here long before the city had zoning bylaws."

"Not only are we one of the only Jewish businesses in the area, we're the only business on the street. There never were a lot – Chicago 58 is on the outskirts of Kensington – but there was a grocery store and a construction company. It's all houses now.

"I'm retired, and the boys are doing what is necessary to stay in business. They're leaving hometown territory, and they're doing their darndest to move the business into the fourth generation."

Meeting on chief's Israel trip ends in chaos

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

HAMILTON – An open forum on Hamilton Police Chief Brian Mullan's involvement in a recent trip to Israel by Ontario law enforcement officials ended abruptly in chaos last week with pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian audience members hurling insults at one another.

The Hamilton Police Services Board held the Sept. 21 meeting to air complaints it received from pro-Palestinian Hamiltonians who said Mullan shouldn't have gone to learn about policing from a state that they say oppresses Palestinians.

The March 1-8 trip, which was was partly sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, was meant to educate Mullan and about 30 other law enforcement officials and politicians – including former Toronto chief Julian Fantino, York Regional Police Chief Armand La Barge and Ontario Community Safety Minister Monte Kwinter – about the latest security and anti-terrorism techniques.

Mullan attended last week's meeting, but was not scheduled to talk. Eighteen speakers – both pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian – were given 10 minutes each to address the board, which was to rule on the matter at the end of the night.

However, 14 scheduled speakers didn't get a chance to make comments after a disturbance led board chair Bernie Morelli, a Hamilton city councillor, to adjourn the meeting early.

When the president of the Niagara Palestinian Association, Susan Howard-Azzeh, took to the podium, she told an overflow crowd of about 100 people at Theatre Aquarius in downtown Hamilton that she is not a "crowd arouser."

Then, despite being advised by Morelli that visual aids were not permitted, Howard-Azzeh began showing slides that depicted Palestinian children crying and cowering in corners. She sad the pictures weren't "offensive or controversial" but "educative" and "factual."

After she refused to heed Morelli's repeated requests to speak without the slides, he asked her to leave the podium.

"How are we supposed to trust Hamilton Police if we can't have an open forum? Are you that afraid of seeing what Israel does?" she yelled in response, over a chorus of cheers and jeers.

At that, pro-Palestinian spectators stood up to leave in protest. With the audience out of their seats and verbally abusing one another, Morelli adjourned the meeting, and both he and Mullan were escorted out of the theatre by plainclothes police officers.

Morelli returned a few minutes later to say that speakers who didn't get a chance to talk could make written submissions that will be reviewed by the board.

"This is just too sensitive a topic to proceed. Quite frankly, I'm disappointed that we're not able to respect each other," Morelli said. "If we are doing any form of damage to any culture, then I can't live with that."

Canadian Jewish Congress executive director Bernie Farber, who was scheduled to speak, said the meeting should never have taken place, because its format "was a recipe for disaster."

"I've never seen anything quite like this. It was hysteria," he added. "I don't believe most Palestinians in Hamilton feel this way. This was an orchestrated attempt to demonize Israel."

York Region's Police Services Board recently dismissed a similar complaint that La Barge's participation in the Israel trip was improper and will hurt policing among minorities.

"It was a trip to understand how to deal with terrorism, how to co-ordinate if there was a terrorist attack… and how Israel deals with everyday crime," Farber said.

He added that, among many other activities, the chiefs discussed community policing tactics and visited a juvenile facility where inmates and senior officers work together. They also observed a full anti-terrorist training demonstration and spoke with the legal advisor to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

"This was a trip focused on creating an educational opportunity for the participants in the areas of public security, law enforcement and emergency preparedness – an area in which Israel is a world leader."

Farber said pro-Palestinian elements in Hamilton used the chief's trip as an excuse to attack Israel.

He said that some people feel that "any police officer that goes to Israel will come back a homicidal maniac. It's absurd."

Former Hamilton city councillor Marvin Caplan, who told The CJN that he has had good relations with Palestinians and Arabs for decades, also felt the meeting should not have happened.

"If the question is, 'Did the police chief do something wrong by going to Israel?' the answer is, 'No, he didn't.' Why did the Police Services Board decide that it was necessary to have the meeting called by a fringe, narrow, tiny group of people within the community who did not understand that terrorism is a real threat?" he asked.

Khawla Ibrahim, a Palestinian woman who attended the meeting, said she was also disappointed by the chaos.

"Some people here are very angry for nothing. There is no reason to spread hatred. I've been home [to Israel]. We were treated better there, with all the bombings and all the throwing of stones, better than we were here tonight."

Still, she said, she is opposed to the police chief visiting Israel.

Another scheduled speaker, Leslie Lasky, president of UJA Federation of Hamilton, said he, too, was disappointed by the "organized attempt to disrupt the meeting," and the false allegations against Israel.

He said he will submit something in writing to show support for the chief.

"We're hopeful that written submissions will result in a fair hearing and will let the community come to the conclusion that [Mullan's trip caused] no damage to the community of Hamilton."

Downtown Ottawa shul unveils renovation, new rabbi

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Ottawa's "downtown shul" celebrated its half-century mark this month by unveiling a major renovation and refurbishment, a new rabbi and new programs aimed at attracting new members.

After years of planning and fundraising – as well as controversy over the shul's move away from its Orthodox roots – the results of the 18-month renovation were unveiled to Congregation Beth Shalom members and friends at a rededication ceremony on Sept. 14.

Cantor Daniel Benlolo and board members Jerry Nudelman and David Baker planned the event to introduce the refurbished building and the congregation's new rabbi, Gary Kessler, to shul members just in time for the new year.

Rabbi Kessler, who has an Orthodox smichah and comes to Ottawa from a pulpit in Corpus Christi, Texas, served at Beth Isaiah Congregation in Guelph for six years in the 1990s.

President Jack Shapiro said he is very proud of what the shul has accomplished.

"I have been president throughout … [this] very rewarding but difficult time," he said. "Nothing like this has happened in 50 years and we have done an awful lot in a little over two years… I am extremely excited."

For most of the past 50 years, the Jewish Community Centre shared a building with the synagogue, but it moved a few years ago to a new location in the city's west end, and now anchors Ottawa's Jewish Community Campus. The renovation subdivided the JCC's part of the building between non-profit agencies and community groups.

When the JCC moved out, there was speculation about whether the synagogue could survive on its own. When it was built, most of Ottawa's Jews lived in the downtown area, but over the years, most moved to the suburbs.

By 2002, the congregation had about 450 member families, about half the number it had 25 years earlier.

In an effort to attract new members, in 2003, two-thirds of the shul's members voted to secede from the Orthodox Union and introduce mixed seating in the sanctuary. The shul also decided to allow bat mitzvah girls to read haftarot – though not to read from the Torah – but it retained its Orthodox liturgy and kashrut standards.

The changes led to the resignation of the shul's chazzan and rabbi, and about 40 to 50 people split off to form a new downtown minyan that eventually became the Orthodox Community Ohev Yisroel.

Benlolo said the shul now has 650 "member units" – singles or families – and he credits the increase to the congregation's change in direction.

Fundraising from members has accounted for the $2.5 million spent to date on the renovations.

"If people put $2.5 million into the building, it's because they believe in it," Benlolo said. "We want people in the community who are unaffiliated to know that a place exists downtown… we want to attract young people. We want to show that we are not only rededicating the physical structure, but also the spiritual side of the congregation."

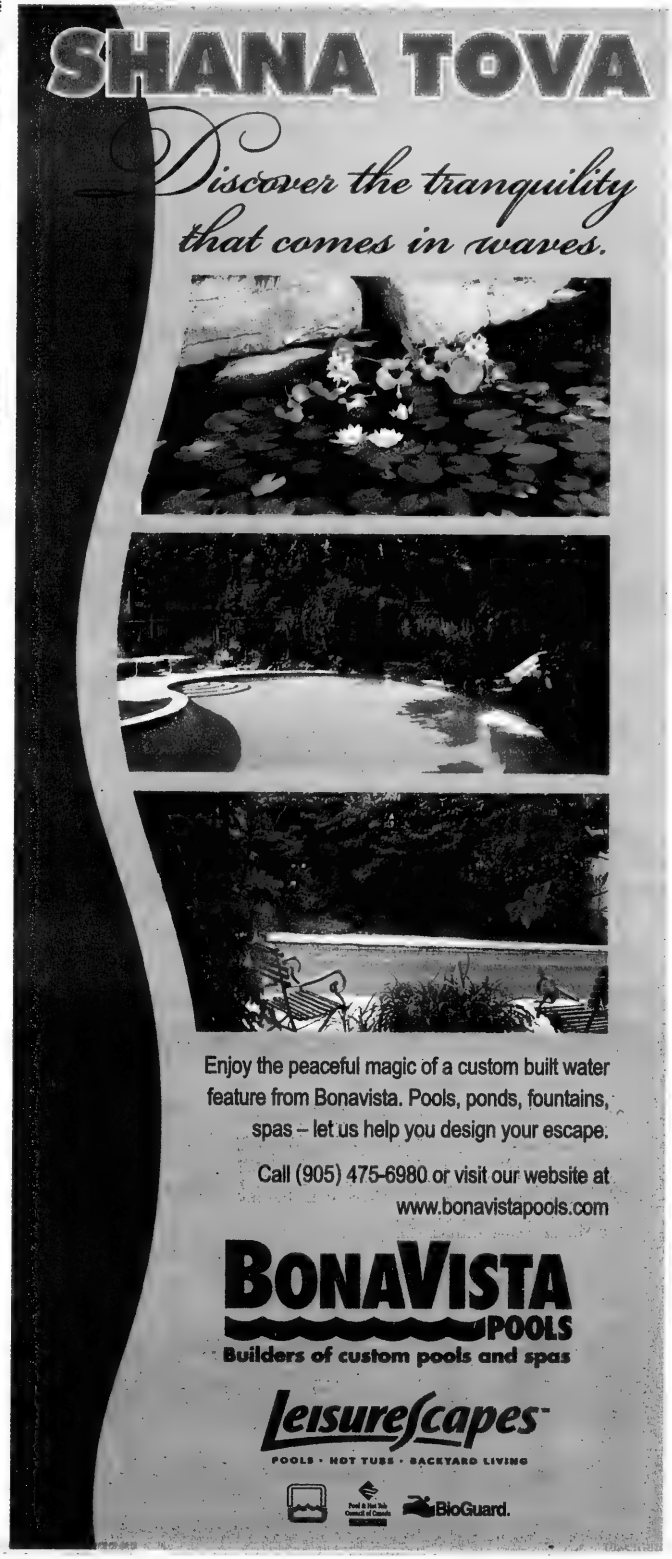
Architectural designer Murray Cohen said his involvement in the project has been both personal and professional.

"I have been a member of the shul since 1954. I was brought up on York Street," he said. "I think that architecture is, like literature and art, part of our culture. I was proud to participate in creating a design that will satisfy the vision today and, hopefully, last another 50 years."

Cohen credits shul secretary Jill Stern and vice-president Ruth Freiman for their leadership and dedication throughout the process. "I am doing the design side, but they have done the management and leadership side of this. They are there every day."

The rededication featured a performance by the Beth Shalom choir and an art exhibit in the foyer and social hall.

"I would eventually like to have the hall available for future art exhibits for the Jewish community," said Benlolo, himself an artist.



Italians, Jews fundraise for Holocaust education

By WENDY SCHNEIDER
Hamilton Jewish News

HAMILTON — The story of how Hamilton's Jewish and Italian communities recently came together to host a fundraising event for Holocaust education is actually the story of two women's shared passion for promoting tolerance and understanding to today's youth.

Madeleine Levy and Mary Romeo are the movers and shakers behind Festitalia Hamilton's recent screening of the film Perlasca at Hamilton Place. The film is about Giorgio Perlasca, an Italian who lived in Hungary during World War II and saved an estimated 5,000 Jewish lives by presenting himself as a Spanish diplomat.

The film presentation and reception was designed to unite the city's Italian and Jewish communities in a fundraising drive for St. Joseph Hospital's Firestone Institute for Respiratory Health and the Hamilton Jewish Federation's Asper Foundation Human Rights and Holocaust Studies Program for High School Students. The event was sponsored by Limeridge Mall and Stelco.

It would be difficult to find two more dissimilar personalities than those of Mary Romeo and Madeleine Levy.

New York-born and bred, Madeleine Levy is bold and forthright, a "won't take no for an answer" kind of person who has established a reputation for knowing what she wants and how to get it. Irish Catholic Mary Romeo, a past recipient of the Hamilton Gallery of Distinction, with a passion for art, opera and just causes, is a reserved yet warm woman who possesses a quiet dignity.

Romeo learned about the film through Carlo Cohen, the head of the Italian Institute of Culture. She said she was deeply moved by the personal example of a man "who would place himself in harm's way neither for countrymen nor co-religionists, but for total strangers, and do it every day with tremendous energy." She acquired the screening rights for the film but wasn't sure where she would show it.

Levy read about Perlasca in a National Post article last summer about a Toronto fundraising event that brought together members of Toronto's Italian and Jewish communities. At the time, she was working on her own big project, the Joshua Nelson concert that brought together members of Hamilton's Jewish and black communities.

But Levy filed Perlasca in the back of her mind as another big project, one that could help raise funds for the Asper Foundation, which, along with UJA Federation of Hamilton, sends Canadian students to the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C.

Levy had made it possible for four local black teenagers to join last year's trip to Washington and was hoping to raise enough funds to send 60 local students from Hamilton's public, private and Catholic boards in 2009.

After the Joshua Nelson concert, Levy made inquiries about how to get the rights to the film. She also learned that Romeo, who chaired this year's Festitalia celebrations, shared her interest in the film. Levy called Romeo and after a two-hour meeting in a Westdale coffee shop, they began working out the details for the film's showings – a morning screening for 2,000 students from across the city and an evening Festitalia event that would include a reception and public screening.

At the evening event, opening remarks were made by Rabbi Bernard Baskin and former Ontario lieutenant- governor Lincoln Alexander. Keynote addresses were given by McMaster university president Peter George and former Ontario premier Bob Rae.

There was no question in either of Levy's or Romeo's minds that the Asper Foundation should be a beneficiary of the event. "It would have been wrong to raise funds for this project and not have it go towards something that was educationally specific," said Romeo.

Levy noted that "at the end of the day what we wanted was to educate the community and the lessons of the life of Giorgio Perlasca focused on personal responsibility."

Romeo added that if only one child who is tempted to participate in a racist act stops to remember Perlasca's example, then it makes the entire endeavour worthwhile.

The descendants of the approximate 5,000 people whose lives were saved by Perlasca now number 35,000. That alone is enough to bring home the lesson that each one of us has the ability to make a difference – a lesson, thanks to two deeply caring individuals, that has reached thousands.

Wishing you a Happy & Healthy New Year

Website reunites B'nai Brith campers

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — There is something magical about the summer camp experience.

And there is an endless fascination with reliving those carefree days of youth. Movies have been made about it and books have been written.

Now, through the Internet, it has become easier than ever to find old friends and to reconnect instantly. For Michael Polowin, an Ottawa lawyer and alumnus of Camp B'nai Brith of Ottawa – fondly referred to as CBB – the Internet has proved an invaluable tool to help create a camp alumni association.

Polowin was amazed at how quickly people responded. In the first three weeks of its existence, the website had almost 300,000 "hits," from across Canada, the United States, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Israel and Hong Kong.

By going to the camp's website, www.cbbottawa.com and clicking on "alumni," it is possible in an instant to travel back in time and find former camp-mates from far and wide.

"The idea is to allow people to reconnect, come together and share their memories, to re-establish their connection to the camp," said Polowin.

"When the camp started posting photos a couple of years ago, I scanned some of my old ones and other people did the same." The idea for the alumni website was a natural offshoot. Polowin has been overwhelmed by the sheer volume of the responses.

Saul Jacobson and Jeff Laks created the website, and Polowin and another former camper, Montealer Danny Chazonoff, have been managing it.

"There were no lists to start out, so there was no other way to track people down. We started out with about 300 e-mail addresses, developed an invitation and sent it out. One hundred and five people registered the first day and from there it has spread," said Polowin.

"I knew I had a deep and abiding love for this place [the camp], but I discovered that there are over 600 others out there [who had registered as of the three-week mark]. The oldest person to register so far is 75 and the youngest is 19."

According to Polowin, "CBB alumni have gone on to be movers and shakers in many fields – heads of major corporations, government, business, celebrities, etc." Actor Saul Rubinek, poet Leonard Cohen and Noah Cantor, of the Toronto Argonauts, are alumni of CBB.

The camp, opened in 1936, serves the Jewish communities of Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal. It has been at the same location, in Quyon, Que, since 1946.

For its 70th anniversary, in 2006, CBB alumni are planning a reunion. Based on the tremendous response to the idea on the alumni website, plans are well underway for a trip down memory lane.

Some can't wait until next summer to see their old friends. A mini-reunion is scheduled for Nov. 5 in Toronto and another is in the planning stages for Montreal.

According to Polowin, the CBB alumni forum has, for many people, become "addictive." Busy professionals, still campers at heart, are spending their spare time sharing their memories. After registering at twt.cbbottawa.com/YaBBSE, people from far and wide are posting their stories.

If you attended CBB and would like to find out what happened to your old bunk-mates and counsellors, visit alumni@cbbottawa.com.

Winnipeg CJA kicks off its annual campaign

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This year's Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal Superweek phone blitz, held from Sept. 11 to 15, raised more than $120,000, including pledges from a number of new donors.

David Greaves, the CJA campaign's newly appointed associate director, noted that a Young Adult Division evening raised $18,000 from 161 attendees. Thirty-four of them were first-time givers.

Last year, Winnipeg's CJA campaign raised just over $4.5 million. It was the seventh year in a row that the campaign sums have increased. This year's target is $4.65 million.

"So far, we are a little ahead of last year's pace," Greaves says.

This year's SuperWeek campaign ended with an invitation-only evening of theatre and music at the Exchange Event Centre downtown. The importance of the annual CJA campaign to the Jewish community was stressed there.

The impact the CJA has on individuals was illustrated through moving monologues delivered by actresses Mariam Bernstein, Brenda Gorlick and Elena Mallin, and by a comedic turn from Debbie Maslowsky. As Esther, the director of "Camp Massad A BB" – Camp Massad and BB, or B'nai Brith Camp, both receive CJA support – the veteran entertainer was a real hoot.

The other actors portrayed an Argentine immigrant welcoming other immigrants from her homeland, a Jewish Child & Family Service foster mother, who recalled how the JCFS was there for her when she was growing up in a broken home, and a recent returnee from the March of the Living speaking to a group of Jewish seniors at the Stay Young Club about her experiences visiting the empty synagogues and death camps in Poland.

Between the various dramatic scenes, which were presented in different parts of the hall, were musical numbers to complement the stories. The first song, At Home, was written and performed by Danny Greaves, who was accompanied by Ari Posner on keyboard. (Both former Winnipeggers, Greaves and Posner now live in Toronto. Greaves was formerly a member of the Winnipeg-based band The Watchmen.)

"We have tried to show the impact that your generosity has on people's lives," Maslowsky told the audience. The stories and songs, she added, were based on interviews conducted over the past few months with people who have benefited from CJA beneficiary agency support. She noted that the impact of contributions to the CJA isn't restricted to Winnipeg, but also that money goes to help less fortunate individuals in Israel, the former Soviet Union and elsewhere.

Sandra Secter, the evening's chair, thanked Kayla Gordon, the former artistic director of the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre and others who assisted her in mounting the production, as well as the musicians and and singer/songwriters.

Secter presented two awards to Elana Dil, the co-founder and first chair of the CJA's Young Adult Division – the Award of Distinction from the United Israel Appeal and an award that recognized her contributions to the Young Adult Division.

Holiday Food Ideas

Pan pals share vegetarian fare for the fall harvest

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

With the changing of the leaves comes a change in the way we cook meals for family and friends. Hearty, warming soups move to the front burner, replacing light summer fare. Vegetarian dishes are always in demand by my readers, so I asked some of my foodie friends to share their favourite vegetarian dishes with you. These are perfect for the High Holy Days and would be wonderful to serve in the sukkah on an autumn evening.

When I moved to Toronto in 1997, I became friends with Judy Mandel, who shares my love of food. When we get together socially, we always discuss recipes. She usually negotiates with me to make one of my fruit crisps when friends gather to break the fast or other holiday celebrations – and she usually manages to convince me. This time, I was able to get her to share this simply terrific broccoli salad, which can be made in advance and is great for guests. She wrote it in pencil on a used envelope that she found in her purse while we were out for brunch (eating again, of course)! I like it without the grated cheese, but you can add it if you wish. Leftovers will keep a couple of days in the fridge, so be happy if you have any! Enjoy.

JUDY MANDEL'S BROCCOLI SALAD FOR A CROWD

2 to 3 bunches broccoli, stems peeled
1 cup chopped red onions
1 cup mayonnaise (light is fine)
2 tbsp. vinegar (regular is fine)
1 to 2 packets sweetener or 1 to 2 tsp. sugar (to taste)
1 cup dried cranberries or raisins
1 cup pine nuts or sunflower seeds
salt and pepper, if desired
1 cup grated cheddar cheese (old or medium), optional

If desired, cook broccoli in boiling water for 1 minute. Place in a colander and rinse thoroughly with cold water; drain well. (This step isn't essential, but makes the broccoli easier to digest.)

Chop broccoli into bite-sized pieces. (Do this in batches in a food processor to save time, using quick on/off pulses.) Place in a large bowl and combine with remaining ingredients except cheese. Mix well. Transfer to a serving bowl. Cover and refrigerate until needed. Sprinkle with cheese at serving time. Serves 12 to 16. Recipe can be halved easily.

My pan pal Nava Atlas, author and illustrator of several popular vegetarian cookbooks, lives in the Hudson Valley region of New York. She shared a scrumptious soup recipe from The Vegetarian Family Cookbook that is family friendly and fabulous. In a recent e-mail, she wrote that the soup is "very much in keeping with the bit of sweetness we're all looking for to start our New Year. And I wish you a happy and healthy Rosh Hashanah!"

NAVA'S CREAM OF BABY CARROT SOUP

No matter what your age, a vegetable puree is a concentrated source of nourishment and a prime form of comfort. Let's face it, though – peeling and chopping two pounds of carrots is a lot of work. I was pleased with the brainstorm of tossing two bags of organic baby carrots (which are usually very sweet) into a soup pot, and even more pleased with how well the idea works. Make sure to use the carrots while still fresh. Once they start drying out, the results won't be as good. Using an immersion blender makes the preparation a breeze.

2 tbsp. light olive oil
1 cup chopped onion
2 16-oz. bags baby carrots, preferably organic
1 vegetable bouillon cube
2 bay leaves
1 tsp. paprika
½ tsp. good-quality curry powder
1½ cups low-fat milk, rice milk or soymilk, more or less as needed
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
1½ cups frozen green peas, warmed

Heat the oil in a soup pot. Add the onion and saute over medium heat, stirring frequently, until golden, about 10 minutes.

Add the carrots and just enough water to not quite cover. Bring to a simmer, then add the bouillon cube, bay leaves, paprika and curry powder. Cover and simmer gently until the carrots are tender, about 15 to 20 minutes.

Remove the bay leaves. If using a food processor, puree the solid ingredients until smoothly pureed, then transfer back to the pot and stir back into the liquid. If using an immersion blender, simply immerse into the pot and process until smoothly pureed.

Stir in enough milk to give the soup a slightly thick consistency. Season with salt and pepper and serve, or cover and let stand off the heat for an hour or so before serving, heat through. Scatter some green peas over the top of each serving. Makes 6 servings.

Cook healthy foods in season

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

When food writers Louise Fiszer and Jeannette Ferrary decided to collaborate on a Jewish cookbook, they wanted to include tasty, cherished holiday recipes that honour age-old traditions, yet are tailored to today's busy, health-conscious cook. But as one traditional Jewish cook warned them, "Don't do anything too weird… Nobody wants to be eating experiments, especially on the High Holy Days."

They say good things come in small packages, and now, just in time for Rosh Hashanah, comes Jewish Holiday Feasts (Chronicle Books), a charming little book, delightfully illustrated by Coco Masuda, now available in hard cover.

The 39 recipes are arranged by season and then by holiday. "The foods of all of these holidays are representative of the season," Fiszer explained. "Plums don't grow in the winter. My philosophy is cook what's fresh and now. It will never taste better later."

Where moms and grandmas of yesteryear spent days in the kitchen preparing for the holidays, today's cooks look for simple recipes that rely on fresh ingredients.

"I've been a cooking instructor for close to 30 years, and I can tell you," said Fiszer, "everybody wants simplicity."

"Today health has to be a factor," said Fiszer by phone from her California home. "The brisket recipe, for example, one of the most popular recipes in the book, was a mix of my mother's and Julia Child's, believe it or not. My mother would brown it in fat, despite the fact that there's a whole layer of fat on the meat, and then add the vegetables. I trim the fat and put it in a dry pot with some liquid and vegetables. There's plenty of fat to go around. I also generally use olive oil. That's another accommodation."

For Rosh Hashanah, for example, we learn that each name for the holiday reflects a different aspect of the significance of this holy day. Yom Hadin refers to the Day of Judgment, "a time of examination, evaluation, and repentance." Yom Hazikaron, the Day of Remembrance, signifies "the eternity of time and the continuity of past and present." And Yom Teruah, the Day of the Blowing of the Horn, recalls the sounding of the shofar, "a reminder of spiritual awakening."

Traditionally on Rosh Hashanah we include new fruits of the season. "We use figs, pomegranates, persimmons, avocados and apples… I love to incorporate these fruits in my recipes." A sweet-tart Persimmon and Pomegranate Salad begins the feast, signifying "the wish for fruitfulness and plenty in the new year."

Fiszer and Ferrary researched traditional Jewish cuisine the world over. The Rosh Hashanah menu includes Ashkenazic Braised Apples and Red Cabbage with Wine as well as Sephardic Couscous with Saffron and Vegetables.

A Round Raisin Challah, de rigueur on the Rosh Hashanah table, is one of many shapes for the new year. Some form the bread into the wings of angels or into a ladder, signifying the wish that our prayers may reach heaven. "We use a round challah, rather than the traditional braiding, to represent the continuation of life," noted Fiszer.

We use honey on Rosh Hashanah, reflecting the wish for a sweet new year. Honey and Cumin-Glazed Cornish Hens is this meal's festive centerpiece. And of course, it wouldn't be Rosh Hashanah without honey cake. Moist with apples and topped with almonds, Hannah's Honey Cake is a fitting end to the holiday feast as we look forward to the sweet new year ahead.

HANNAH'S HONEY CAKE

1 cup hot brewed coffee
1 tsp. baking soda
1 cup honey
1 cup sugar
½ cup vegetable or canola oil
3 eggs
3 cups all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1 tsp. ground ginger
1 tsp. freshly grated nutmeg
1 large apple, cored and grated
12 whole blanched almonds

Preheat the oven to 350. Grease a 9x13-inch baking pan. In a small bowl, combine coffee and baking soda. Set aside. In a large bowl, beat honey, sugar and oil until well blended. Beat in eggs, one at a time, until mixture looks homogenized. In a medium bowl, sift together flour, baking powder, cinnamon, ginger, and nutmeg.

Beat flour mixture alternately with coffee mixture until well combined. Stir in apple. Pour batter into prepared pan. Place almonds on top of batter, to mark the centre of each of 12 squares. Bake until golden brown, about 45 minutes. Cool and cut into squares. Serves 12.

HONEY AND CUMIN-GLAZED CORNISH HENS

Glaze
½ cup honey
2 tbsp. fresh orange juice
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
3 tbsp. cumin seed, toasted and crushed
3 tbsp. olive oil
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. freshly ground pepper
4 Cornish hens, split in half
salt and pepper

Combine glaze ingredients. Preheat oven to 400. Rinse hens and blot dry. Sprinkle with salt and pepper. Using about a third of the glaze, brush both sides of hen halves. Place, skin side down, on a baking sheet with low sides. Place in oven and roast 10 minutes. Turn heat down to 375, brush hens again with half the remaining glaze and roast 5 minutes. Turn hens over and roast 10 minutes. Brush with remaining glaze and roast until deep golden brown, about 5 minutes more. Let stand about 10 minutes before serving. Serves 8.

Legal battle ends as Tegegne receives a kidney

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Baruch Tegegne, who had threatened to go to court to get a kidney offered to him free of charge by a stranger, is convalescing after undergoing a transplant at the Montreal hospital he wanted to sue.

Tegegne, 61, who has been hailed as a hero of the rescue of Ethiopian Jews in the 1980s, underwent the surgery at the end of August at the Royal Victoria Hospital and is slowly recovering, said his lawyer Michael Bergman.

Bergman said his client remains strongly in favour of permitting live-organ donations by unrelated persons, and will hold a press conference as soon as he is well enough. The kidney he received was from a donor who had died.

In March, Tegegne, Bergman and Toronto-based filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici held a press conference to denounce the Royal Victoria for refusing to perform the transplant using the kidney of a 30-year-old man in India, Shree Dhar. Dhar responded to an advertisement placed on Tegegne's behalf by Jacobovici on the website www.matchingdonors.com, which connects persons needing organs with those willing to give their own without compensation.

In June, a fundraising campaign was launched to enable Tegegne to have the surgery in Israel.

The Royal Victoria does not perform transplants using organs donated by strangers, even if they are purportedly acting altruistically. Dr. Douglas Keith, head of the Royal Victoria's living donor transplant program, said at the time that the hospital could not be certain that no quid pro quo agreement existed between the recipient and the donor. The buying and selling of organs is illegal in Canada.

Bergman would not speculate on whether Tegegne's impending legal action influenced the Royal Victoria, which is part of the McGill University Health Centre. "But I find it very ironic that [the transplant was performed] on the verge of our launching the lawsuit. I was just setting a date with the [hospital's] lawyer... Maybe it was just a coincidence."

Baruch Tegegne
[File photo]

Bergman said the average wait in Canada for a kidney transplant is three years. Tegegne, a diabetic, was diagnosed with kidney disease in 2002 and has been on the waiting list for an organ since the beginning of 2004. He had been undergoing dialysis four times a week.

"The intention was not to seek favourable treatment. The goal was to raise the issue of living donors, which still remains very much in the air and needs to be resolved. People are waiting an inordinate amount of time for organs while their health deteriorates, when there are many people of good faith who, whether for religious or moral reasons, are willing to give an organ to someone in need...

"There is a growing body of legal and ethical opinion in favour of accepting these offers if it save lives... There needs to be greater debate in the medical community and, more importantly, among the public on this issue."

Bergman said about 15 other people in North America and Europe offered Tegegne a kidney after hearing about his plight.

As for ascertaining whether these are indeed donations with no compensation, Bergman said hospitals have to take potential donors at their word, just as courts accept sworn statements. "We're asking for a threshold of certainty that does not exist in other human endeavours... We have to have trust, otherwise our entire society would break down."

He also noted that donating a kidney is not as complicated or life-threatening a procedure as it was 50 years ago.

Bergman's legal argument is that the Royal Victoria's refusal endangered Tegegne's life and thereby violated his rights under the Canadian and Quebec charters.

Bergman also claimed the hospital was denying him the right to medical treatment under the Canada Health Act and Quebec health-care legislation, as well as in contravention of the medical profession's Hippocratic oath.

The Royal Victoria subsequently wrote to Bergman that it would not perform the transplant using Dhar's kidney because it would breach the medical profession's code of ethics.

Jacobovici was unable to find another Canadian hospital to do the transplant under these circumstances. A number of American hospitals were willing, but their fees were too high, he said.

People who donated funds to enable Tegegne to be operated on in Israel may choose to have their money returned or put to some other good use, Bergman said. Rambam Medical Center in Haifa had agreed to perform the transplant using Dhar's kidney, and Jacobovici spearheaded a drive to raise the $120,000 (US) he said was needed to cover the total costs.

The hospital itself was charging $70,000 (US), which Jacobovici said was reduced because of Tegegne's role in helping his fellow Ethiopian Jews. The money was being collected through the Toronto-based Canadian Friends of the Rambam Medical Center.

Jacobovici's 1983 documentary Falasha: Exile of the Black Jews told the story of Tegegne's role in the rescue of Jews from famine-stricken Ethiopia.

Ottawa designates Congress founding as 'historic' event

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The 1919 founding of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has been recognized by the federal government as an event of national historic significance for Canada.

Acting on the recommendation of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada, Stephane Dion, the minister responsible for Parks Canada, has included CJC's establishment among 14 new designations of people, places and events that have "helped to shape Canada's past and contributed to its development as a nation."

The first plenary session of CJC, held in Montreal at the Monument National from March 16-19, 1919, has been hailed by Parks Canada as "a testament to a major nation-wide democratic exercise" to create a body representative of the Jewish community throughout Canada. The 209 delegates were elected by the approximately 25,000 Jews in the country at the time.

"In addition to giving Canadian Jews unity, national status and a voice on the national and international scenes, the CJC would prove to be a veritable forum for Judaism in Canada, as well as a major force in integrating the Jewish community and in recognizing and channelling the contributions of its members," the announcement said.

Parks Canada notes that CJC has over its history been "at the forefront of many of the great struggles for human rights, equality, immigration reform and civil rights in Canada."

A plaque commemorating the founding will be placed in the Monument National at a future date.

CJC welcomed the honour.

"The founding of Canadian Jewish Congress gave Canadian Jews their first opportunity to speak with a representative and united voice on national and international issues of concern to their community," said Congress' national president Ed Morgan.

"Canada's Jewish community has contributed significantly to the fabric of Canada, and this designation commemorates CJC's place in Canadian history. We are honoured to be counted among the others who have received historical designation, and we look forward to continuing our efforts to represent our community here at home and around the world."

The three other new events of national historic significance are Canada's participation in the Boer War of 1899-1902; the establishment of the Polymer Corporation in Sarnia, Ont.; and the Franco-Aboriginal Alliance of 1603 forged at Baie Ste. Catherine, Que. There are now 364 national historic events.

In the last couple of years, Parks Canada has been encouraging the nominations of people, sites and events significant among ethnocultural communities.

CJC national archivist Janice Rosen, who convened an ad hoc committee to make nominations from the Quebec Jewish community, said four other suggestions were made.

They are poet A.M. Klein and Hirsch Wolofsky, founder of the Yiddish newspaper Der Kanader Adler and the English-language Jewish Chronicle, which "seem to be getting serious consideration," she said.

The other nominations were the old garment district on St. Lawrence Boulevard and further north, and the "Jewish campus" of the 1930s and '40s around Jeanne Mance Street and Mount Royal Avenue, where many community institutions were located.

The recognition of CJC's founding comes at an auspicious moment, Rosen said. "At a time where so many Jewish institutions are restructuring, and people are wondering whether we need CJC, it seems to reinforce the significance of an organization that continues after more than 85 years."

שרון החדש

בחודשים הקרובים ילך הציבור הישראלי לקלפי כדי לבחור את הנציגים שלו לכנסת. די ברור שמרכז הליכוד רחוק מאריק שרון בשנת אור. הם מאמינים שהיציאה מעזה היתה טעות, ושאין להחזיר לפלשתינאים שטחים נוספים בגדה המערבית. כך גם האמין אריק שרון במשך שנים רבות. משאלי דעת קהל רבים מראים שכיום רוב הציבור בישראל רואה בהמשך השלטון בפלשתינאים סיכון והחלשה למדינת ישראל, ורובם המוחלט אינו רוצה שילדיו ינָנו על מתנחלים תוך סיכון חיים. לפני שבועיים בעצרת האר"מ הבחיר אריק שרון שהוא יישר קו עם הרוב הישראלי. רוצה לאמר: ניתוק מוחלט מן הליכוד. לדעת רוב הפרשנים עומד אריק להקים מפלגה חדשה שתתפרס את הלך הרוח המרכזי בציבור הישראלי.

הפופולאריות של שרון בישראל ובעולם גברה מאוד עם השלמת פינוי עזה, בד בבד עם ירידת התמיכה בו בליכוד. ולאלה שמטילים ספק ביכולתו האסטרטגית, כדאי לזכור שאריק היה זה שהקים את מפלגת הליכוד תוך צרוף הליבראלים ותנועת החרות, מפלגה שתוך שנים ספורות הפילה את השמאל הישראלי.

כך שמחכה לנו חודף חם, מעניין, ולאלה מיכם שתומכים בדעת הרוב בישראל-גם תקווה שאולי סוף סוף יקוצר רוב פוליטי לסיים את הקונפליקט.

אני ער לכך שמעבר לים, בקנדה, ארה"ב ושאר קהילות קודש עדיין נשמעים קולות של "לא לותר", "לא לתת". לעניות דעתי-רוב הנְדָרים האלה היו משנים את דעתם ואולי אפילו ממירים את דתם אם ילדיהם שלהם צריכים היו לשרת בג'ינין. אבל שישאר בינינו.

ניו אורלינס

אסונות טבע קורים בכל העולם, מצונאמי בדרום מזרח אסיה לרעידות אדמה באיראן. אבל יש מאפיינים מאוד מיוחדים באסון של ניו אורלינס. קודם כל, בניגוד לרעידות אדמה דומיהם-זה היה צפוי, כיוון שהעיר כולה בנוייה מתחת לפני הים באזור מִבְּה טיפופים וטורנאדו.

שנית, בואה של הסופה, בניגוד לצונאמי ולרעידות אדמה, היה ידוע מראש, וטכנית ניתן היה להוציא משם את כולם.

אבל העיקר: האסון גילה את אמריקה החלשה שאיש לא רוצה להציג לעולם: ערים גדולות, עם עוני קשה ופשע בלתי נשלט בעיקר באוכלוסיה השחורה, אנשים שלא מזיזים לבנש ואנשים את קצה הציפורן. האם לא הגיוני היה שלפני שבש הוכן להושיע את העיראקים (שלא ביקשו ממנו לבוא) ולהטביע במדבר מאות מיליארדי דולארים-שיטפל בעניי ארצו קודם, שיתן להם ביטוח בריאות וידאג לרווחתם הבסיסית?

לא, לא באמריקה. ממש סיפור מדהים.

שנה חדשה

לא הספקנו לזוז וכבר שנה חדשה. מעבר למילים היפות שיש לי לאמר לכם, הינה הצעה להחלטה שכדאי לכם לקבל ושמ"ש אם יש לכם ילדים, ואם אינכם דתיים או חברים בבית כנסת, ואם אין הם הולכים לבית ספר יהודי-תדאגו שילכו לתנועת נוער ישראלית-ציונית. אל תוותרו!!! אם לא תעשו כך-סיכויים עצומים שהם ינתקו מן הקשר לעמם ותרבותם.

כשתתעוררו-זה יהיה מאוחר מדי. ואז, כשיהיו ילדיכם מתחת לחופה עם גבר או אשה לא יהודיים-אל תגידו שלא ידעתם.

פשוט הייתם עצלנים. שתהיה שנה טובה.

Does Abbas have a plan to rein in terror?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Now that Israel has completed its disengagement from Gaza and parts of the northern West Bank, the Canadian and international media are pressing the Palestinian Authority to take full political responsibility for the Gaza Strip, to establish security control and to begin building a civil society.

The Toronto Star editorial "Gaza's liberation a work in progress" (Sept. 14) said: "While [PA President Mahmoud] Abbas has urged Palestinians to create a 'model' self-governing authority in Gaza, he in fact presides over an anarchic proto-state run by corrupt officials, terrorized by armed factions and which has yet to fully accept that violence is not the way forward."

The Star argued that Abbas must "assert the Palestinian Authority's uncontested rule. Palestinians must have one, democratic government, willing to enforce public order, to suppress anti-Israel incitement and terror… It must have a monopoly on the use of force." This means reining in the Islamic extremist organizations – Hamas, Islamic Jihad and even Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades, which is linked to Abbas' own Fatah party.

The paper also called for further concessions from Israel: "Palestinians should be free to travel from Gaza to Egypt without Israeli restrictions, to reopen Gaza's airport, to build a seaport and to set up a road or rail link to the West Bank."

The Star should have argued that the easing of travel restrictions must be consistent with Israel's valid security concerns. During a week of no border controls between Gaza and Egypt, there were numerous reports (mostly in the Israeli media) of arms smuggling, including of rockets that can reach Israeli southern cities. As well, Al Qaeda agents may have crossed from Egypt into Gaza with plans to instigate terrorism in the West Bank.

While the Star editorial calls for Israel to bolster Abbas, it properly concludes that "the Palestinian Authority must take charge. That is the most important part of Gaza's liberation."

The Globe and Mail editorial "Out of Gaza's chaos" (Sept. 20) made similar points: "If the PA and its leader Mahmoud Abbas hope to establish themselves as credible partners in future negotiations with Israel, they must first show they can run the store."

The Globe wrote: "For years, Palestinian leaders have been able to blame the Israeli occupation for all their people's woes, even if much of the trouble was caused by their own corruption and maladministration. Well, that excuse is gone now. The Israelis have departed, at least from Gaza. Mr. Abbas and his team must now show that they are able to run a clean and effective government that can keep the peace on its own turf."

Like the Star, the Globe said Abbas "must rein in the armed men who challenge his rule." It particularly noted that the "most powerful force in Gaza today is not the PA but Hamas, the militant group that seeks to wipe Israel off the map and has led the terrorist assault on the Jewish state over the past few years."

These editorial positions are fully consistent with the international community's requirement (expressed in the preamble to the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan) that the Palestinian leadership must act "decisively against terror" and must also be "willing and able to build a practising democracy based on tolerance and liberty."

All of which leads one to ask how, on the one hand, Abbas is supposed to rein in the terrorists and, on the other, allow them to run in upcoming (January) elections?

Israel's leadership has firmly stated that unless Hamas disarms and renounces its covenant calling for the Jewish state's destruction, Israel will not aid in the Palestinian election process.

It's up to journalists to ask the requisite tough questions: Will Hamas disarm before the elections and show a commitment to reform, or does it intend to keep its own militias and platform committed to Israel's destruction, and if so, what exactly is Abbas prepared to do about it?

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.o

Fellowship lures Jewish leaders of tomorrow

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

There may be a few Jewish student groups to choose from when deciding how to become more involved in the community, but how often will you get paid for your time and effort?

The Maimonides Leaders Fellowship Program, in its third year of operation, offers a $500 stipend to Jews who attend a college or university in the GTA, regardless of their denomination and level of Jewish knowledge.

The fellowship, which has expanded from the University of Toronto to York University, is a 10-week program that exposes participants to ideas of leadership and teaches them about social issues in a Jewish context.

Upon graduation, the student will receive the award as an acknowledgement of the time commitment necessary to fully participate in the program in lieu of other responsibilities.

Rabbi Mark Zelunka, an organizer of the program, said it is meant to address "a vacuum in Jewish leadership.

"Jewish people, Jewish organizations, have seen that young people are not as involved Jewishly as their parents were – whether by being involved with synagogues, taking leadership roles in Jewish organizations or giving money to support Jewish causes," Rabbi Zelunka said.

Throughout the program, participants meet each week for two hours to work with renowned Jewish educators and leaders, such as Rabbi Michael Skobac, director of Jews for Judaism, and Adrienne Gold, a television commentator and media personality.

According to the website, the guests "will speak from a classical Jewish perspective on topics crucial to understanding one's Jewish heritage and acting in a leadership capacity on campus and in communities."

More important, Rabbi Zelunka said, is that the program provides young Jews with the guidance they need to become involved and make a difference.

"Most Jewish organizations have seen the need to develop and spur on leadership development among young Jewish people. The whole idea is that we want to empower Jewish people to lead in whichever direction they see fit. We're just giving them the tools and information that they need," he said.

From left, Dave Burden the leadership education consultant for AEPi North America poses for a picture with Rabbi Mark Zelunka, an organizer of the Maimonides Leaders Fellowship Program.

The kinds of lectures that are meant to arm Jewish students with the knowledge they need to contribute to the community include, "The Real Reason Behind Anti-Semitism," "Who Am I Really? Jewish Identity and Self-Esteem," and" The Leader Within You: How to Change the World in Six (Easy?) Steps."

Dave Burden, the education leadership consultant for AEPi North America – a Jewish fraternity – and a Maimonides graduate, said being a part of the program was a great way to become more informed and more involved in the Jewish community.

"I obviously loved the program. It was well organized and highly informative. The speakers were of a very prestigious calibre, the topics they spoke on were interesting," Burden said.

Rabbi Zelunka said the program, which runs at 20 universities across North America, is meant to enrich the lives of those involved in hopes that they will give back to the community by teaching others what they have learned.

"I always tell the students that to represent the Jewish people, you have to know what the Jewish people represent. We don't want just leaders of Jews, but we want a Jewish leader – Jews that lead based on Jewish ideals and values," he said.

Horowitz takes over at York U's Centre for Jewish Studies

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Sara Horowitz, the new director of at York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, says she is "following a master" in replacing Prof. Martin Lockshin, the centre's director for the past for years.

Horowitz – who has a PhD from Brandeis University in comparative literature, with a special interest in Holocaust literature – has been filling in for Lockshin since July, when he began serving as chair of the university's division of humanities.

"It's lovely to be able to follow someone who leaves things in such wonderful shape and has fostered such good will in both the university and the Jewish community," Horowitz said of her predecessor, who has been teaching Jewish studies at York for 28 years.

While she would be the first to say what a wonderful director Lockshin was, she is also excited about using her past experience at an American university to improve Canada's largest Jewish studies program.

Before she came to York six years ago, Horowitz taught at the University of Delaware, where she landed after graduating from Brandeis in 1985.

At the time, Delaware didn't have many Jewish students compared to other East Coast American schools. It did, however, have many Jewish faculty, and not long after her arrival, Horowitz said, interest grew about creating a Jewish studies program there. With her deep knowledge of Jewish literature, her colleagues thought she would be the right person to make it happen.

Because of her experience creating a Jewish studies program from nothing but an idea, Lockshin said he and his colleagues were confident Horowitz would be perfect for the job at York.

Sara Horowitz

"Sara is extremely experienced. She directed a centre for Jewish studies at another university and it was very successful. She is an acknowledged, recognized scholar who has risen to positions outside of York University by being vice-president of the Association for Jewish Studies and brings great honour to York University," Lockshin said.

Aside from her administrative and academic responsibilities – ranging from overseeing scholarly programs, to helping faculty with questions or problems, to continuing to build on a relationship between the Jewish community and the centre – Horowitz also wants to build on the strong foundation established by Syd Eisen, Michael Brown and Lockshin, the directors who preceded her.

"I have the very good fortune to follow very fine directors. In some measure, I want to continue in their path. They were wonderful administrators, wonderful diplomats, they had a lot of patience, a lot of commitment and devotion to the program. They have created some areas of strength in the Jewish teacher education program, which is a gem in our crown, and I want to keep that strength," Horowitz said.

But as much as she admires the work of her predecessors, she would like to make a few improvements.

"I'd like to see Sephardic studies come into its own. We offer some courses in Sephardic studies, but we do not offer a full-time person. I'd love to see a full time position in Israel studies. I'd like to see a larger role for the arts. I'd like to see a bit more on women's issues," said Horowitz, who writes a monthly column for The CJN.

Lockshin, who is going on sabbatical next fall, said the 400 students who take part in Jewish studies classes benefit from having a different leader from time to time.

"It is very rare that somebody stay in their administrative position for more than five years. The Centre for Jewish Studies has been around for 16 years, and [Horowitz] is the fourth director. It is for the betterment of the centre that it shouldn't just be the private fiefdom of one person," he said.

He feels he's leaving the centre in good hands.

"In many ways, she has increased the profile of York University, because she is acknowledged in the scholarly world. She is also a mensch, a pleasure to work with, a team player. Sometimes you worry when you put someone in charge that they'll just take it off in a direction that is in their interest and nobody else's interest. It would never cross my mind with Sara Horowitz."

Lockshin will fill the position of humanities chair until he goes on sabbatical next year, but he said Jewish studies will always be part of his life.

"I certainly haven't left the area of Jewish studies. I'm doing research in Jewish studies. I'm still on the executive committee on the Centre for Jewish Studies. It's somebody else's turn to run the centre," said Lockshin, who plans to spend his year off doing research at Hebrew University in Jerusalem on medieval Jewish Bible commentaries.

"Judaism plays a central role in my life. The intellectual challenges of figuring out how Jews adapted to different countries, different situations, different intellectual worlds in ancient times, in medieval times, in modern times… I'm fascinated."

The Centre for Jewish Studies at York University

An Innovative Environment for Scholarship and Growth

MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR

Sara R.Horowitz, Director

As always, the beginning of the academic year coincides with Rosh Hashana. At the Centre for Jewish Studies we find ourselves preparing simultaneously for the school term and for the Yamim Nora'im, the High Holidays. Although these two events are different, they have some common points.

Rosh Hashana compels us to look inward and backwards, as we take account of where we have been and what we have done. We acknowledge our accountability for our actions and our responsibility for who we have become. Commitments we have taken on or not taken on, obligations we have fulfilled or not fulfilled, have shaped our lives. At the same time, our tradition teaches us that our past does not seal our destiny and that it need not determine our future. Rosh Hashana holds open the possibility of change and renewal.

The educational programs at our Centre also open up the future to change and renewal. Both students and teachers bring to the classroom all the experience and knowledge that they have acquired and that define them. But this is only the starting point. Through interacting and learning together, we deepen our understanding and affirm important life commitments.

Our Centre has a far-reaching mandate. The Centre for Jewish Studies administers the largest university level program in all of Canada, and one of the four largest outside of Israel. Our faculty members are active as scholars and as teachers, and serve as advisors and consultants for projects and institutions important to the Jewish community at home and abroad. Through a wide range of activities on and off campus, the Centre promotes Jewish Studies for Jewish and non-Jewish students, develops Jewish teacher education across Canada and offers stimulating programs for the community. We teach about Judaism, Jewish texts, history, culture, languages and literatures.

We owe our success to our dedicated faculty, our enthusiastic students and to our many friends and supporters in the Jewish community.

"The Centre's programs open up the future to change and renewal."

As the Director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, I invite all of you to become involved in the activities at the Centre. Join us for lectures and cultural events, check out our courses and help us to grow and develop further.

Together with my colleages at the Centre, I wish all of you a fruitful and sweet New Year. Shana Tova.

Yiddish at York, a new curricular initiative, was celebrated at a reception in March, 2005 attended by many of our Yiddish students, their parents and grandparents. Professor Keith Weiser, incumbent of the Silber Family Chair in Holocaust and Eastern European Studies, and two students, Joshua Tenenbaum and Rachel Libman, spoke about the continuing importance of Yiddish language to Jewish culture. The program is a partnership between the Centre for Jewish Studies, the UJA Federaton of Greater Toronto's Committee for Yiddish and the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. Two levels of instruction will be offered in 2005-2006.

Jewish Studies grew at York U because of trust

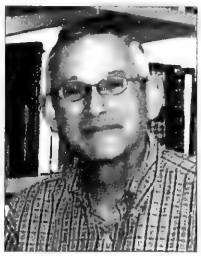
These are excerpts from an address on the occasion of Martin Lockshin's stepping down as director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University, Sept. 7, 2005.

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

Today on the Hebrew calendar is the 3rd of Elul 5765, an important date, the 70th anniversary of the death of one of the most significant intellectual figures of modern Jewish history, Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook.

Rabbi Kook, the first Ashkenazic chief rabbi of modern Israel, is well- known for his original and ground-breaking attitudes to Zionism, to secularism, to modernity, to vegetarianism, to evolution and to many other issues that were important in his days and in ours. Tonight I wanted to say a few words about Rabbi Kook's attitude to universities and to university Jewish studies.

It must have been quite a sight when Rabbi Kook attended the opening ceremonies of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem 80 years ago, in April 1925, all decked out in traditional rabbinic garb including a large-brimmed fur shtreiml hat and a long black coat, as was the custom of the ultra-Orthodox sector, and delivered a speech that deserves to be studied carefully. In this speech, Rabbi Kook outlined both the hopes and the fears that he had about the establishment of a university in Jerusalem.



Martin Lockshin

Perhaps I should mention that not everyone who attended that opening ceremony on Mount Scopus in 1925 had nice things to say about Rabbi Kook's speech. The journalist Avraham Almaliach, writing in the Doar Hayom newspaper, wrote: "There was unlimited enthusiasm in hearing the speeches and the visionary predictions… of the High Commissioner to Palestine on the one hand… and disappointment… to hear the midrashic sayings and convoluted logic of Rabbi Kook… on the other hand. The head of the rabbis peppered his listeners with psalms…. What was the point of all his length?… In spite of all this, I respect Rabbi Kook very very much…"

As an aside, Almaliach is far from alone in claiming to have the greatest respect and reverence for Rabbi Kook while actually having very little tolerance for anything specific that Rabbi Kook ever taught or wrote. Over the years, many good Jews have followed Almaliach's example.

Well, what did Rabbi Kook say in his allegedly long-winded remarks?

He said and I quote only a very small part: "The spirit of Israel has two approaches. One approach [here he is referring to the world of the yeshivot] is internal and completely holy, useful for strengthening the spirit. The second approach… has as its objective not only enhancing holiness… internally, but also providing a framework for exporting and for importing… for exporting the concepts and values of Judaism from our own private domain to the public domain of the general world. And for importing the general scientific knowledge of greater humanity and adopting or adapting the good and the appropriate from those values to our national storehouse. To these ends, this university might serve as a lofty and a crucial vehicle."

But then Rabbi Kook also went on to outline the fears that he had about the creation of a university in Zion, fears that related in part specifically to the field of Jewish Studies. Rabbi Kook was very concerned that the search for scholarly objective truth as practised in the academy went against the best interests of the Jewish religion. Fears like those of Rabbi Kook are still found from time to time in some corners of the Jewish community. And fears from the opposite perspective are also expressed from time to time within the academy – that Jewish studies by nature involves the promotion of Jewish values and the Jewish religion and that such activities are more appropriate in a yeshiva or in a Sunday school than in the academy.

I must say that of all of our accomplishments at the Centre for Jewish Studies, the one that I am most proud of is that we manage to walk the difficult fine line – the line that even Rabbi Kook was not certain could be walked – between the values of the community and the values of the academy.

We managed at York to establish and build, for example, the world's most successful and largest university-based Jewish teacher education program, despite concerns of some naysayers who worried that a program without any Jewish denominational grounding could never train a Jewish educator.

Our faculty which consists of Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and unaffiliated Jews obviously could not and would not promote one particular vision of what Judaism is about. And yet this faculty manages to train some of the finest Jewish educators around. The success of our program has led to the creation of a number of other impressive non-denominational university-based programs in the last few years, such as the Pardes-Hebrew U program, a program whose founders, I think, would admit that it is modelled in part on our successes.

York affirms policy against classes on High Holy Days

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

An attempt by a Jewish professor to end York University's longstanding tradition of cancelling classes on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur has failed.

York re-affirmed the policy last week after a report prepared for the university's senate said that in would not be in the school's best interest to hold classes on holidays observed by 10 per cent of its student body.

The report was commissioned in response to complaints from York history professor David Noble, who is Jewish, that the policy violated a section of the York University Act of 1965, which he contends forbids the school from imposing religious observance on students and faculty.

A York spokesperson told The CJN earlier this month that the section of the act cited by Noble was meant to protect professors from having to comply with a particular religious view to teach at the school.

"York University is committed to respecting the religious beliefs and practices of all members of the community, and making accommodations for observances of special significance to students, faculty and staff," the school said in a statement.

Noble has declared that, as an act of civil disobedience, he will hold classes regardless of the policy, though he said he won't penalize students who can't attend for religious reasons.

But Zac Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto, said students shouldn't worry about classes being held on the High Holy Days.

"We worked with the university and requested there be a reaffirmation of the policy. The policy was posted on the [university's] website on [Sept. 16], so Jewish students shouldn't be concerned."

Academic successes of program are impossible to deny

And the other form of criticism – that university-based Jewish studies is too Jewish and not sufficiently academic—is also occasionally raised around our academy. But the academic successes of our program are impossible to deny. Even using the unpopular but most common model for measuring academic success – counting the number of successful applications by professors for peer-reviewed research grants from academic bodies like SSHRC, the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada – York's Centre for Jewish Studies has much to be proud of.

We are one of the most successful research centres at York University in attracting grants that are peer-reviewed by other academics. Last year, in the division of humanities at York, there were only two successful SSHRC grant applications – both in Jewish studies. Similar patterns have been common for as long as I have been keeping track.

Why are we at York more successful than many or most other universities in walking the fine line required for Jewish Studies in a university?

I think that the most important reason for our success can be summed up in one word: trust. The university administration trusts us. The university originally started Jewish studies at York. It was not first created by an initiative from the Jewish community, as was the case in many other universities. And then, once we had begun, the Jewish community also gave us its trust. Led by a number of community leaders over the years, we have been given a level of support, financially and otherwise, for which we are most grateful.

The journalist Almaliach claimed that he had great respect for Rabbi Kook, but he certainly did not trust him. Rabbi Kook claimed to have great respect for the secular Zionists who set up the Hebrew University, but he clearly did not trust them either. Most of his comments about the Hebrew University in the last 10 years of his life related to his disappointment in the decision of Hebrew U. to teach Jewish studies in a manner that differed from the way it is taught in a yeshiva.

So on behalf of my colleagues and myself, I thank all of you who are here this evening – from York's administration and from the Jewish community – for trusting us.

It's too bad that Rabbi Kook could not have seen how well town and gown work together here in Toronto.

Martin Lockshin is the chair of the department of humanities at York University in Toronto.

U of Ottawa honours prominent Jewish family

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to the CJN

OTTAWA — A student residence at the University of Ottawa was recently named in honour of a prominent member of the Jewish community.

The new U of O building on Laurier Avenue is now called the Hyman Soloway Residence in honour of community icon, lawyer, businessman and family man Hyman Soloway, who died in July 2004.

"It's a tremendous honour and it connects two large themes of his life, education and Ottawa," Soloway's son, Lawrence, told The CJN in a phone interview.

Naming the residence is "a lasting and visual testament to Hyman Soloway's contribution," said David Mitchell, U of O's vice-president of university relations.

Even though neither Hyman Soloway nor anyone in his family has attended the U of O, he was very involved with the university.

After immigrating to Canada from Ukraine in 1924, Soloway attended Glebe Collegiate in Ottawa, Queen's University in Kingston, Ont., and Osgoode Hall in Toronto. After serving in the Canadian Army, he began his career as a lawyer and soon rose to prominence.

He was appointed to the University of Ottawa's board of governors in 1990 and sat on the board "until his health didn't permit him to serve anymore," Lawrence Soloway. "It was just an endeavour that he got a lot of satisfaction from."

U of O conferred an honorary doctorate on Soloway in 1996. In 1998, the Hyman Soloway Chair in Business and Trade Law was established in his honour. The position provides a focal point for linking scholars with government lawyers and the private sector.

Mitchell said Soloway had a fondness for students and was a real leader while sitting on the board of governors.

He added that the U of O underwent tremendous growth in terms of new buildings and the number of students registering while Soloway sat on the board.

"He helped shape the modern U of O as we know it," Mitchell said. "In that sense, he was really one of our great architects."

The residence opened in September 2004 and was named this summer in a special ceremony. The residence has space for 239 students. The furnished two-, three- and four-bedroom units offer basic utilities, air conditioning, telephone, cable and Internet, card access and video surveillance security. The rent ranges from $650 to $700 a month for a typical four-bedroom unit.

Soloway helped establish a number of Ottawa law firms and was involved in the community, supporting the General Hospital, the Jewish Community Council and other organizations. He was a member of the Canadian Jewish Congress and was president of the Ottawa Jewish Community Council. The Jewish community centre in Ottawa is called the Soloway Jewish Community Centre.

Israel reacts after Gaza attacks

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Just two weeks after Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip, fighting with the Palestinians has resumed – and with the sound and fury of a full-blown border war.

Israeli forces answered Hamas rocket salvoes from Gaza with air strikes, arrest sweeps in the West Bank and, in an unprecedented move, by putting its artillery on standby to fire.

The escalation began with a terrorism-sparked tragedy: At least 15 people were killed last Friday when a munitions truck taking part in a Hamas victory parade in Gaza exploded by accident.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, embarrassed by the chaotic display of arms that are banned under the U.S.-led "road map" peace plan, condemned the Islamist faction as irresponsible.

But with its prestige on the line just months before a January election for the Palestinian Authority Parliament, Hamas put its own spin on the blast, calling it an Israeli air strike or sabotage.

Vowing to "open the gates of hell" on Israel, Hamas launched at least 35 Qassam rockets across the Gaza border at the southern Israeli town of Sderot. At least five Israelis were wounded in the strikes.

Israel has braced for such a scenario ever since completing its Gaza withdrawal on Sept. 12.

But the escalation could not have come at a worse time for Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, just before the Likud Central Committee was scheduled to vote on a motion by Likud rival Benjamin Netanyahu to hold a primary election in which the prime minister could be unseated as party leader. Many in the Likud opposed the withdrawal, saying it would both reward and encourage terrorism.

Sharon ordered a counterterrorist offensive on a scale not seen in months. Two suspected Gaza terrorists died and several munitions factories were destroyed in air strikes.

Islamic Jihad vowed to avenge the death of Mohammed Khalil, commander of Islamic Jihad's military wing in Gaza, who was killed in an Israeli air strike Sunday night. His deputy was killed as well, and four other people were wounded in the attack. As well, 207 fugitives, including top Hamas officials, were detained in the West Bank.

"I instructed that there are no restrictions on the use of any measures in order to strike at the terrorists, their equipment and where they find shelter. The instructions are unequivocal; we do not mean a one-time action here," Sharon told his cabinet.

"I am certain that it is within our ability to halt the terrorist organizations' actions against us. The activity will not only be in Gaza but will also be against terrorism in Judea and Samaria," he said.

Sharon received a boost from the United States, with the new U.S. ambassador to Israel, Richard Jones, telling reporters: "We all know that the terrorists are trying to provoke Israel at a very sensitive time, and we understand exactly what the government's position is and the response it has taken."

Dry Bones

EU appeals to Israel, PA

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The European Union's (EU) head of foreign policy appealed to Israel and the Palestinians on Monday not to squander the opportunity to revive the possibilities for peace offered by Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip.

Javier Solana said a surge of violence, in which Israel fired missiles into Gaza on Monday in response to Palestinian rocket fire, showed the road ahead would not be easy.

"The stakes are high. The leadership on both sides is under serious pressure. Both sides need Gaza disengagement to work, with important elections looming next year, and so do we," Solana told a conference in Paris.

"For the Palestinians, this is a chance to win over the skeptics, in Israel and elsewhere, [to show] that they can actually run their own affairs in a responsible manner," he told the Institute for Security Studies of the European Union.

"For Israel, the logical priority is to ensure that Gaza will not become hostile territory from which terrorists launch attacks on neighbouring communities and the rest of Israel.

"Events in the last few days and hours have reminded us that this will not be easy."

The worst increase in violence since Israel completed its pullout from Gaza on Sept. 12 after 38 years of occupation has put pressure on a shaky ceasefire.

Solana, the EU's high representative for common foreign and security policy, said the 25-nation bloc is prepared to step up its involvement in the region.

He reiterated that the EU is ready to help the Palestinians reform their police and security forces with training, equipment and financial support.

British treasurer Gordon Brown said Monday he would visit the Middle East next month to look at ways to rebuild Palestinian infrastructure.

Tackling poverty and unemployment in Palestinian areas would help bring stability to the region, Brown said in an interview with the Guardian newspaper.

Brown, widely seen as the most likely successor to Prime Minister Tony Blair, said he had held talks with the European Investment Bank and the World Bank to identify possible investment in infrastructure projects.

"I have talked to the Israeli finance ministry, and I hope we can make a contribution that will recognize that a strong and fair economy can lower the amount of violence and underpin development," Brown said.

"In the Palestinian Authority area, unemployment is 30 per cent and maybe more. The area needs to grow by 10 per cent a year for many years if we are going to tackle unemployment and poverty."

Gaza's unemployment and poverty rates exceed 50 per cent, with many of the 1.4 million Palestinians living on two euros or less a day.

The poor state of the economy presents a challenge to the Palestinian Authority after Israel's pullout of troops and settlers earlier this month.

Brown has already outlined proposals for the European Commission and European Investment Bank to offer guarantee loans to investors putting money into start-up firms in the region.

The Palestinian Authority's national economy minister, Mazen Sinnukrot, has said he hopes to attract 1.5 billion to two billion euros in private investment annually for the first three years after Israel's pullout from Gaza.

As part of its economic reforms, in 2006, the Palestinian Authority plans to privatize all government-owned enterprises such as the Gaza airport, the national cement and oil companies and a planned Mediterranean port, and to invite foreign bids.

Likud split as party votes on early primaries

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — As Prime Minister Ariel Sharon cast his ballot Monday in the Likud central committee vote on advancing the date for party primaries, he urged committee members to vote against the move.

The proposal, promoted by MKs Benjamin Netanyahu and Uzi Landau, was widely seen as a bid to overthrow Sharon, their rival for the Likud chairmanship.

Nearly half – 48.5 per cent – of 3,050 central committee voters had voted by 5 p.m. Monday, five hours before polls were due to close. The polls opened at 10 A.M. at the Tel Aviv Exhibition Grounds, where the central committee members met the night before, and results were expected at midnight.

The issue could seal the fate of the embattled party: If the central committee votes to advance the date of the primaries, Sharon could bolt the Likud and start his own party.

"I hope the central committee members will come to vote against the proposal, which will seriously damage the Likud," Sharon told reporters at the polls Monday.

He also referred to the speech that went undelivered at Sunday night's central committee debate on moving up the primaries.

Sharon walked out of the meeting when the microphone stopped working. The event left rival Likud camps in an uproar Monday, stung by the spectacle of a sitting prime minister silenced at his own party convention.

Sharon's departure effectively broke up the meeting, which degenerated into angry recriminations between his supporters and opponents, each accusing the other of sabotaging the sound system.

Sharon returned to the exhibition grounds to cast his ballot shortly before 2 p.m. Monday. Alluding to the microphone flap in quips to reporters, he asked those standing near him, "Can you hear me? Are you sure you can hear me?"

He said he had intended to speak the night before about "the conduct of the Likud as a ruling party," but was unable to do so.

Even before the microphone fiasco, the Sunday meeting was marked by unprecedented incivility: as Sharon was about to start speaking, a group of his opponents walked out of the hall, an act that officials from Sharon's office likened to Muslim leaders' leaving the UN General Assembly hall when Sharon got up to speak there earlier this month.

Likud MK Michael Eitan said Monday the Likud leadership had allowed "political terrorism, sabotage, the closing-down of microphones."

Citing incidents in the past where Likud central committee members had come to blows and hurled chairs at one another, Eitan said party leaders had failed to address the phenomenon.

"Democratic discussions can take place without screaming and shrieking and going crazy and lowering ourselves to the lowest level possible, at times engaging in slugging of one sort or another," he told Israel Radio.

"The whole world looks upon and sees a prime minister kept… from taking part in a discussion."

Sharon had planned to say that advancing the primary would be "suicide that would destroy the Likud and bring it to one place only – the opposition."

Netanyahu, Israel's finance minister, told central committee members Sunday night that whoever wants to leave the party should do so now. That was a clear reference to Sharon, whose aides have insinuated in recent weeks that Sharon would leave the Likud and form a new party should the motion to advance the primary pass.

Speaking over the heckling, Netanyahu also accused Sharon of having moved the party to the far left of the political spectrum through his disengagement plan.

"We're not Meretz, we're not left of Meretz, we're the Likud," Netanyahu said.

After initial attempts to solve the microphone problem, including activating a back-up system, failed, Likud director general Arik Barami charged that Sharon's speech had been sabotaged, saying the prime minister's opponents poured a bucket of water on the microphone's electrical connections.

Police later said that an informal examination produced no evidence of sabotage: no cables were disconnected, nor was there any sign that water had been spilled on them. However, police added that they were waiting for a formal complaint before opening an official investigation, which would involve expert electricians who might uncover a less obvious form of sabotage.

"Are we a democratic movement or the movement of one person who ignores all our decisions?" Netanyahu asked, referring to Sharon's decision to proceed with the disengagement even after the plan was decisively defeated in a referendum of party members.

"The Likud does not belong to me and it does not belong to you, Arik. We belong to the Likud."

Landau, who led the Likud's anti-disengagement camp, rejected the argument that advancing the primary would destroy the party, arguing the Likud could not lose more ground than it already has under Sharon.

"Whoever says the Likud is in power is deceiving himself," he said. "The Likud is not in power, because all its basic positions have been violated."

In a sign of Sharon's eroding support, Education Minister Limor Livnat, who had supported the prime minister until now, spoke in favour of advancing the primary – though in an interview with Israel Radio earlier in the day, she insisted that "early primaries are a technical matter, not an ousting."

She also used her central committee speech to urge Sharon to promote settlement construction. "The permit is in your hand," Livnat said, in remarks directed at Sharon. "Tell them to begin construction."

Livnat added that her decision to support early primaries followed attempts to reach a compromise acceptable to both Netanyahu and Sharon.

Ministers Silvan Shalom, Meir Sheetrit and Tzipi Livni, in contrast, spoke against moving up the primary, warning that doing so would damage the Likud. Both Shalom and Sheetrit warned that advancing the primary would lead to early elections, which in turn could bring the left into power.

"I have never before seen a party prepared to give up on its ruling power with such joy and jump into the abyss," Sheetrit said. "I'm telling you: Be careful. Those who support advancing the primary are going to destroy the Likud… The left could rise to power and give up the entire Land of Israel."

German Jews await election outcome

By TOBY AXELROD
JTA

BERLIN — German Jewish leader Paul Spiegel looks forward to working with Germany's next chancellor – whoever that may be.

Spiegel, head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, applauded both the incumbent Social Democratic Party and the challenging Christian Democratic Party at the close of an election Sunday that was so tight that it might have to be held again. As the secular body representing Jews in Germany, the Central Council must work closely with whatever party is in power.

With the Social Democrats and the Christian Democrats both claiming victory, Spiegel said the Jewish community can't lose either way: both parties applaud the growth of Jewish life in Germany and support strong ties with the United States and Israel, even if they oppose the war in Iraq.

For many Jews in Germany, the pro-U.S. and pro-Israel stances offer reassurance of Germany's strength as a democracy.

But Germany's economic woes are of great concern, said Deidre Berger, head of the American Jewish Committee office in Berlin.

> 'Most voted for parties on the left'

"While this election seemed inconclusive, it did make clear that for many voters reform was the main issue," Berger said. "The tremendous last-minute gains of the Social Democrats demonstrated that there is a commitment among many voters to continuing the badly needed social and economic reforms in Germany.

"From a Jewish perspective, it seems important that a coalition solution be found that creates a stable foundation for further reforms," she added. "We also hope that potential coalitions will consider integrating a commitment to combating anti-Semitism within their coalition platform."

German Jewish journalist Richard Chaim Schneider said the question is not whether the new government is good or bad for the Jews, but whether it will be able to make significant progress on the country's main problems within the next four years.

"If there's no light at the end of the tunnel, the fringes will be strengthened, left and right equally," Schneider said. "Then it will be bad for every minority in Germany, most of all Turks and other foreigners."

Conversations with German Jews indicated that most voted for parties on the left – the Social Democrats or their coalition partners, the Green Party – while few voted for the Christian Democrats.

In general, they said, they appreciated the economic and social reforms Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder has begun implementing, his support for Jewish immigration and the strong backing for Israel shown by both Schroeder and his foreign minister, Joschka Fischer of the Greens.

Uriel, a Jewish man in his late 20s, voted for the Social Democrats on the local level and the Greens at the national level.

This governing coalition "has started difficult economic reforms that the previous government of [former Chancellor] Helmut Kohl had put off for way too long. The current government has more or less accepted that Germany is a nation of immigration," he said. He added, "I support the Mideast politics of Fischer and believe that the health and pension reforms, as well as liberalization of gay marriage, represent a step in the right direction."

Esther, a woman in her 30s, said she voted for the Social Democrats because she feels the party is more committed to social causes and because of what she considers Schroeder's "remarkable" opposition to the war in Iraq.

"The economy is not the only answer to problems," she said. "I think generosity, culture,and social-minded thinking are the basis for the moral survival of every society."

Irene Runge, head of the independent Jewish Cultural Association in the former East Berlin, wrote that Jewish voters in Germany reflect the country's mainstream political spectrum, but that most Jews in Germany can't vote, as they're not yet citizens.

There are some 106,000 Jews in Germany today, a fourfold increase since 1990 due to immigration from the former Soviet Union.

For Spiegel, a clear sign that Jews should be living in Germany was the contract he signed in 2003 with Schroeder, which placed the Jewish community on the same legal level with the Protestant and Catholic churches.

"That's an historic achievement," Spiegel said.

But Spiegel also respects the party of challenger Angela Merkel, the East German-born protégé of Kohl, the former chancellor.

"I have complete confidence that" Merkel's Christian Democratic Party "pursues a correct political course for this country," Spiegel said. "I have problems with some politicians, but never with the party itself."

In 2003, Merkel was slow to distance the party from Martin Hohmann, an ultra-conservative party member who referred to Jews as a "nation of perpetrators" because of the role some Jews played in the Russian Revolution.

The comments were made in the context of efforts to deflect ordinary Germans' responsibility for the actions of the Nazis.
